

THE HISTORY OF MIDDLE-EARTH
CHRISTOPHER TOLKIEN

THE BOOK OF LOST TALES — Part II — J.R.R. TOLKIEN

[illegible]

Contents

Cover

Title Page

Preface

I The Tale of TinÃ¶viel

Â Â Â Â Notes

Â Â Â Â Commentary

II Turambar and the FoalÃ³kÃ¶

Â Â Â Â Notes

Â Â Â Â Commentary

III The Fall of Gondolin

Â Â Â Â Notes

Â Â Â Â Commentary

IV The Nauglafring

Â Â Â Â Notes

Â Â Â Â Commentary

V The Tale of EÃ¶rendel

Â Â Â Â Notes and Commentary

[VI The History of Eriol or Ã¶lfwine and the End of the Tales
Ã¶lfwine of England](#)

Â Â Â Â Notes and Commentary

Appendix: Names in the Lost Talesâ€”Part II

Short Glossary of Obsolete, Archaic, and Rare Words

Searchable Terms

About the Author

Other Books by J. R. R. Tolkien

Copyright

About the Publisher

PREFACE

This second part of The Book of Lost Tales is arranged on the same lines and with the same intentions as the first part, as described in the Foreword to it, pages 10â11. References to the first part are given in the form âI. 240â, to the second as âp. 240â, except where a reference is made to both, e.g. âI. 222, II. 292â.

As before, I have adopted a consistent (if not necessarily âcorrectâ) system of accentuation for names; and in the cases of Mim and Niniel, written thus throughout, I give MÃ®m and NÃ¬niel.

The two pages from the original manuscripts are reproduced with the permission of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and I wish to express my thanks to the staff of the Department of Western Manuscripts at the Bodleian for their assistance. The correspondence of the original pages to the printed text in this book is as follows:

(1) The page from the manuscript of The Tale of TinÃ©viel. Upper part: printed text page 24 (7 lines up, the sorest dread) to page 25 (line 3, so swiftly). Lower part: printed text page 25 (11 lines up, the harsh voice) to page 26 (line 7, but Tevildo).

(2) The page from the manuscript of The Fall of Gondolin. Upper part: printed text page 189 (line 12, âNow,â therefore said Galdor to line 20 if no further). Lower part: printed text page 189 (line 27, But the others, led by one Legolas Greenleaf) to page 190 (line 11, leaving the main company to follow he).

For differences in the printed text of The Fall of Gondolin from the page reproduced see page 201, notes 34â36, and page 203, Bad Uthwen; some other small differences not referred to in the notes are also due to later changes made to the text B of the Tale (see pages 146â7).

These pages illustrate the complicated âjigsawâ of the manuscripts of the Lost Tales described in the Foreword to Part I, page 10.

The third volume in this âHistoryâ will contain the alliterative

Lay of the Children of Hãrin (c. 1918â1925) and the Lay of Leithian (1925â1931), together with the commentary on a part of the latter by C. S. Lewis, and the rewriting of the poem that my father embarked on after the completion of The Lord of the Rings.

I

THE TALE OF TINĀVIEL

The Tale of TinĀviel was written in 1917, but the earliest extant text is later, being a manuscript in ink over an erased original in pencil; and in fact my father's rewriting of this tale seems to have been one of the last completed elements in the Lost Tales (see I. 203â4).

There is also a typescript version of the Tale of TinĀviel, later than the manuscript but belonging to the same âphaseâ of the mythology: my father had the manuscript before him and changed the text as he went along. Significant differences between the two versions of the tale are given on pp. 41 ff.

In the manuscript the tale is headed: âLink to the Tale of TinĀviel, also the Tale of TinĀviel.â The Link begins with the following passage:

âGreat was the power of Melko for ill,â said Eriol, âif he could indeed destroy with his cunning the happiness and glory of the Gods and Elves, darkening the light of their dwelling and bringing all their love to naught. This must surely be the worst deed that ever he has done.â

âOf a truth never has such evil again been done in Valinor,â said Lindo, âbut Melko's hand has laboured at worse things in the world, and the seeds of his evil have waxen since to a great and terrible growth.â

âNay,â said Eriol, âyet can my heart not think of other griefs, for sorrow at the destruction of those most fair Trees and the darkness of the world.â

This passage was struck out, and is not found in the typescript text, but it reappears in almost identical form at the end of The Flight of the Noldoli (I. 169). The reason for this was that my father decided that the Tale of the Sun and Moon, rather than TinĀviel, should follow The Darkening of Valinor and The Flight of the Noldoli (see I. 203â4, where the complex question of the re-ordering of the Tales at this point is discussed). The opening words of the next part of the Link, âNow in the days soon after the telling of this taleâ, referred, when they were written, to the tale of The Darkening of Valinor and The Flight of the Noldoli; but it is never made plain to what tale they were to refer when TinÃviel had been removed from its earlier position.

The two versions of the Link are at first very close, but when Eriol speaks of his own past history they diverge. For the earlier part I give the typescript text alone, and when they diverge I give them both in succession. All discussion of this story of Eriolâs life is postponed to Chapter VI.

Â

Now in the days soon after the telling of this tale, behold, winter approached the land of Tol EressÃa, for now had Eriol forgetful of his wandering mood abode some time in old Kortirion. Never in those months did he fare beyond the good tilth that lay without the grey walls of that town, but many a hall of the kindreds of the Inwir and the Teleri received him as their glad guest, and ever more skilled in the tongues of the Elves did he become, and more deep in knowledge of their customs, of their tales and songs.

Then was winter come sudden upon the Lonely Isle, and the lawns and gardens drew on a sparkling mantle of white snows; their fountains were still, and all their bare trees silent, and the far sun glinted pale amid the mist or splintered upon facets of long hanging ice. Still fared Eriol not away, but watched the cold moon from the frosty skies look down upon Mar Vanwa TyaliÃva, and when above the roofs the stars gleamed blue he would listen, yet no sound of the flutes of Timpinen heard he now; for the breath of summer is that sprite, and or ever autumnâs secret presence fills the air he takes his grey magic boat, and the swallows draw him far away.

Even so Eriol knew laughter and merriment and musics too, and song, in the dwellings of Kortirionâeven Eriol the wanderer whose heart before had known no rest. Came now a grey day, and a wan afternoon, but within was firelight and good warmth and dancing and merry childrenâs noise, for Eriol was making a great play with the maids and boys in the Hall of Play Regained.

There at length tired with their mirth they cast themselves down upon the rugs before the hearth, and a child among them, a little maid, said: "Tell me, O Eriol, a tale!"

"What then shall I tell, O VÃ«annÃ«?" said he, and she, clambering upon his knee, said: "A tale of Men and of children in the Great Lands, or of thy homeâand didst thou have a garden there such as we, where poppies grew and pansies like those that grow in my corner by the Arbour of the Thrushes?"

Â

I give now the manuscript version of the remainder of the Link passage:

Â

Then Eriol told her of his home that was in an old town of Men girt with a wall now crumbled and broken, and a river ran thereby over which a castle with a great tower hung. "A very high tower indeed," said he, "and the moon climbed high or ever he thrust his face above it." "Was it then as high as Ingilâs Tirin?" said VÃ«annÃ«, but Eriol said that that he could not guess, for "twas very many years ago since he had seen that castle or its tower, for "O VÃ«annÃ«, said he, "I lived there but a while, and not after I was grown to be a boy. My father came of a coastward folk, and the love of the sea that I had never seen was in my bones, and my father whetted my desire, for he told me tales that his father had told him before. Now my mother died in a cruel and hungry siege of that old town, and my father was slain in bitter fight about the walls, and in the end I Eriol escaped to the shoreland of the Western Sea, and mostly have lived upon the bosom of the waves or by its side since those far days."

Now the children about were filled with sadness at the sorrows that fell on those dwellers in the Great Lands, and at the wars and death, and VÃ«annÃ« clung to Eriol, saying: "O Melinon, go never to a warâor hast thou ever yet?"

"Aye, often enough," said Eriol, "but not to the great wars of the earthly kings and mighty nations which are cruel and bitter, and many fair lands and lovely things and even women and sweet maids such as thou VÃ«annÃ« Melinir are whelmed by them in ruin; yet gallant affrays have I seen wherein small bands of brave men do sometimes meet and swift blows are dealt. But behold, why speak we of these things, little one; wouldst not hear rather of my first ventures on the sea?â

Then was there much eagerness alight, and Eriol told them of his wanderings about the western havens, of the comrades he made and the ports he knew, of how he was wrecked upon far western islands until at last upon one lonely one he came on an ancient sailor who gave him shelter, and over a fire within his lonely cabin told him strange tales of things beyond the Western Seas, of the Magic Isles and that most lonely one that lay beyond. Long ago had he once sighted it shining afar off, and after had he sought it many a day in vain.

âEver after,â said Eriol, âdid I sail more curiously about the western isles seeking more stories of the kind, and thus it is indeed that after many great voyages I came myself by the blessing of the Gods to Tol Eressâ«a in the endâwherefore I now sit here talking to thee, VÃ«annÃ«, till my words have run dry.â

Then nonetheless did a boy, Ausir, beg him to tell more of ships and the sea, but Eriol said: âNayâstill is there time ere Ilfiniol ring the gong for evening meat: come, one of you children, tell me a tale that you have heard!â Then VÃ«annÃ« sat up and clapped her hands, saying: âI will tell you the Tale of TinÃ«viel.â

Â

The typescript version of this passage reads as follows:

Â

Then Eriol told of his home of long ago, that was in an ancient town of Men girt with a wall now crumbled and broken, for the folk that dwelt there had long known days of rich and easy peace. A river ran thereby, oâer which a castle with a great tower hung. âThere dwelt a mighty duke,â said he, âand did he gaze from the topmost battlements never might he see the bounds of his wide domain, save where far to east the blue shapes of the great mountains layâyet was that tower held the most lofty that stood in the lands of Men.â âWas it as high as great Ingilâs Tirin?â said VÃ«annÃ«, but said Eriol: âA very high tower indeed was it, and the moon climbed far or ever he thrust his face above it, yet may I not now guess how high, O VÃ«annÃ«, for âtis many years ago since last I saw that castle or its steep tower. War fell suddenly on that town amid its slumbrous peace, nor were its crumbled walls able to withstand the onslaught of the wild men from the Mountains of the East. There perished my mother in that cruel and hungry siege, and my father was slain fighting bitterly about the walls in the last sack. In those far days was I not yet war-high, and a bonds slave was I made.

âKnow then that my father was come of a coastward folk ere he wandered to that place, and the longing for the sea that I had never seen was in my bones; which often had my father whetted, telling me tales of the wide waters and recalling lore that he had learned of his father aforetime. Small need to tell of my travail thereafter in thralldom, for in the end I brake my bonds and got me to the shoreland of the Western Seaâand mostly have I lived upon the bosom of its waves or by its side since those old days.â

Now hearing of the sorrows that fell upon the dwellers in the Great Lands, the wars and death, the children were filled with sadness, and VÃ«annÃ« clung to Eriol, saying: âO Melinon, go thou never to a warâor hast thou ever yet?â

âAye, often enough,â said Eriol, âyet not to the great wars of the earthly kings and mighty nations, which are cruel and bitter, whelming in their ruin all the beauty both of the earth and of those fair things that men fashion with their hands in times of peaceânay, they spare not sweet women and tender maids, such as thou, VÃ«annÃ« Melinir, for then are men drunk with wrath and the lust of blood, and Melko fares abroad. But gallant affrays have I seen wherein brave men did sometimes meet, and swift blows were dealt, and strength of body and of heart was provenâbut, behold, why speak we of these things, little one? Wouldst not hear rather of my ventures on the sea?â

Then was there much eagerness alight, and Eriol told them of his first wanderings about the western havens, of the comrades he made, and the ports he knew; of how he was one time wrecked upon far western islands and there upon a lonely eyot found an ancient mariner who dwelt for ever solitary in a cabin on the shore, that he had fashioned of the timbers of his boat. âMore wise was he,â said Eriol, âin all matters of the sea than any other I have met, and much of wizardry was there in his lore. Strange things he told me of regions far beyond the Western Sea, of the Magic Isles and that most lonely one that lies behind. Once long ago, he said, he had sighted it glimmering afar off, and after had he sought it many a day in vain. Much lore he taught me of the hidden seas, and the dark and trackless waters, and without this never had I found this sweetest land, or this dear town or the Cottage of Lost Playâyet it was not without long and grievous search thereafter, and many a weary voyage, that I came myself by the blessing of the Gods to Tol Eressâ«a at the lastâwherefore I now sit here talking to thee, VÃ«annÃ«, till my words have run dry.â

Then nevertheless did a boy, Ausir, beg him to tell more of ships and the sea, saying: âFor knowest thou not, O Eriol, that that ancient mariner beside the lonely sea was none other than Ulmoâs self, who appeareth not seldom thus to those voyagers whom he lovesâyet he who has spoken with Ulmo must have many a tale to tell that will not be stale in the ears even of those that dwell here in Kortirion.â But Eriol at that time believed not that saying of Ausirâs, and said: âNay, pay me your debt ere Ilfrin ring the gong for evening meatâcome, one of you shall tell me a tale that you have heard.â

Then did VÃ«annÃ« sit up and clap her hands, crying: âI will tell thee the Tale of TinÃ«viel.â

The Tale of TinÃ«viel

I give now the text of the Tale of TinÃ«viel as it appears in the manuscript. The Link is not in fact distinguished or separated in any way from the tale proper, and VÃ«annÃ« makes no formal opening to it.

âWho was then TinÃ«viel?â said Eriol. âKnow you not?â said Ausir; âTinÃ«viel was the daughter of TinwÃ« Linto.â âTinwelintâ, said VÃ«annÃ«, but said the other: âTis all one, but the Elves of this house who love the tale do say TinwÃ« Linto, though VairÃ« hath said that TinwÃ« alone is his right name ere he wandered in the woods.â

âHush thee, Ausir,â said VÃ«annÃ«, âfor it is my tale and I will tell it to Eriol. Did I not see Gwendeling and TinÃ«viel once with my own eyes when journeying by the Way of Dreams in long past days?â¹ âWhat was Queen Wendelin like \(for so do the Elves call her\),² O VÃ«annÃ«, if thou sawest her?â said Ausir.

âSlender and very dark of hair,â said VÃ«annÃ«, âand her skin was white and pale, but her eyes shone and seemed deep, and she was clad in filmy garments most lovely yet of black, jet-spangled and girt with silver. If ever she sang, or if she danced, dreams and slumbers passed over your head and made it heavy. Indeed she was a sprite that escaped from LÃ³rienâs gardens before even KÃ´r was built, and she wandered in the wooded places of the world, and nightingales went with her and often sang about her. It was the song of these birds that smote the ears of Tinwelint, leader of that tribe of the Eldar that after were the Solosimpi the pipers of the shore, as he fared with his companions behind the horse of OromÃ« from Palisor. IlÃºvatar had set a seed of music in the hearts of all that kindred, or so VairÃ« saith, and she is of them, and it blossomed after very wondrously, but now the song of Gwendelingâs nightingales was the most beautiful music that Tinwelint had ever heard, and he strayed aside for a moment, as he thought, from the host, seeking in the dark trees whence it might come.

And it is said that it was not a moment he hearkened, but many years, and vainly his people sought him, until at length they followed OromÃ« and were borne upon Tol EressÃ«a far away, and he saw them never again. Yet after a while as it seemed to him he came upon Gwendeling lying in a bed of leaves gazing at the stars above her and hearkening also to her birds. Now Tinwelint stepping softly stooped and looked upon her, thinking âLo, here is a fairer being even than the most beautiful of my own folkâfor indeed Gwendeling was not elf or woman but of the children of the Gods; and bending further to touch a tress of her hair he snapped a twig with his foot. Then Gwendeling was up and away laughing softly, sometimes singing distantly or dancing ever just before him, till a swoon of fragrant slumbers fell upon him and he fell face downward neath the trees and slept a very great while.

Now when he awoke he thought no more of his people (and indeed it had been vain, for long now had those reached Valinor) but desired only to see the twilight-lady; but she was not far, for she had remained nigh at hand and watched over him. More of their story I know not, O Eriol, save that in the end she became his wife, for Tinwelint and Gwendeling very long indeed were king and queen of the Lost Elves of Artanor or the Land Beyond, or so it is said here.

Long, long after, as thou knowest, Melko brake again into the world from Valinor, and all the Eldar both those who remained in the dark or had been lost upon the march from Palisor and those Noldoli too who fared back into the world after him seeking their stolen treasury fell beneath his power as thralls. Yet it is told that many there were who escaped and wandered in the woods and empty places, and of these many a wild and woodland clan rallied beneath King Tinwelint. Of those the most were Ilkorindi—which is to say Eldar that never had beheld Valinor or the Two Trees or dwelt in Kâ´râ and eerie they were and strange beings, knowing little of light or loveliness or of musics save it be dark songs and chantings of a rugged wonder that faded in the wooded places or echoed in deep caves. Different indeed did they become when the Sun arose, and indeed before that already were their numbers mingled with a many wandering Gnomes, and wayward sprites too there were of Lâ³rienâs host that dwelt in the courts of Tinwelint, being followers of Gwendeling, and these were not of the kindreds of the Eldaliâ«.

Now in the days of Sunlight and Moonshen still dwelt Tinwelint in Artanor, and nor he nor the most of his folk went to the Battle of Unnumbered Tears, though that story toucheth not this tale. Yet was his lordship greatly increased after that unhappy field by fugitives that fled to his protection. Hidden was his dwelling from the vision and knowledge of Melko by the magics of Gwendeling the fay, and she wove spells about the paths thereto that none but the Eldar might tread them easily, and so was the king secured from all dangers save it be treachery alone. Now his halls were builded in a deep cavern of great size, and they were nonetheless a kingly and a fair abode. This cavern was in the heart of the mighty forest of Artanor that is the mightiest of forests, and a stream ran before its doors, but none could enter that portal save across the stream, and a bridge spanned it narrow and well-guarded. Those places were not ill albeit the Iron Mountains were not utterly distant beyond whom lay Hisilâ³mâ« where dwelt Men, and thrall-Noldoli laboured, and few free-Eldar went.

Lo, now I will tell you of things that happened in the halls of Tinwelint after the arising of the Sun indeed but long ere the unforgotten Battle of Unnumbered Tears. And Melko had not completed his designs nor had he unveiled his full might and cruelty.

Â

Two children had Tinwelint then, Dairon and TinÃ°viel, and TinÃ°viel was a maiden, and the most beautiful of all the maidens of the hidden Elves, and indeed few have been so fair, for her mother was a fay, a daughter of the Gods; but Dairon was then a boy strong and merry, and above all things he delighted to play upon a pipe of reeds or other woodland instruments, and he is named now among the three most magic players of the Elves, and the others are Tinfang Warble and IvÃ°jrÃ° who plays beside the sea. But TinÃ°vielâs joy was rather in the dance, and no names are set with hers for the beauty and subtlety of her twinkling feet.

Now it was the delight of Dairon and TinÃ°viel to fare away from the cavernous palace of Tinwelint their father and together spend long times amid the trees. There often would Dairon sit upon a tussock or a tree-root and make music while TinÃ°viel danced thereto, and when she danced to the playing of Dairon more lissom was she than Gwendeling, more magical than Tinfang Warble neath the moon, nor may any see such lilting save be it only in the rose gardens of Valinor where Nessa dances on the lawns of never-fading green.

Even at night when the moon shone pale still would they play and dance, and they were not afraid as I should be, for the rule of Tinwelint and of Gwendeling held evil from the woods and Melko troubled them not as yet, and Men were hemmed beyond the hills.

Now the place that they loved the most was a shady spot, and elms grew there, and beech too, but these were not very tall, and some chestnut trees there were with white flowers, but the ground was moist and a great misty growth of hemlocks rose beneath the trees. On a time of June they were playing there, and the white umbels of the hemlocks were like a cloud about the boles of the trees, and there TinÃ°viel danced until the evening faded late, and there were many white moths abroad. TinÃ°viel being a fairy minded them not as many of the children of Men do, although she loved not beetles, and spiders will none of the Eldar touch because of UngweliantÃ°âbut now the white moths fluttered about her head and Dairon trilled an eerie tune, when suddenly that strange thing befell.

Never have I heard how Beren came thither over the hills; yet was he braver than most, as thou shalt hear, and âtwas the love of wandering maybe alone that had sped him through the terrors of the Iron Mountains until he reached the Lands Beyond.

Now Beren was a Gnome, son of Egnor the forester who hunted in the darker places³ in the north of HisilÃ³mÃ«. Dread and suspicion was between the Eldar and those of their kindred that had tasted the slavery of Melko, and in this did the evil deeds of the Gnomes at the Haven of the Swans revenge itself. Now the lies of Melko ran among Berenâs folk so that they believed evil things of the secret Elves, yet now did he see TinÃ³viel dancing in the twilight, and TinÃ³viel was in a silver-pearly dress, and her bare white feet were twinkling among the hemlock-stems. Then Beren cared not whether she were Vala or Elf or child of Men and crept near to see; and he leant against a young elm that grew upon a mound so that he might look down into the little glade where she was dancing, for the enchantment made him faint. So slender was she and so fair that at length he stood heedlessly in the open the better to gaze upon her, and at that moment the full moon came brightly through the boughs and Dairon caught sight of Berenâs face. Straightway did he perceive that he was none of their folk, and all the Elves of the woodland thought of the Gnomes of Dor LÃ³min as treacherous creatures, cruel and faithless, wherefore Dairon dropped his instrument and crying âFlee, flee, O TinÃ³viel, an enemy walks this woodâ he was gone swiftly through the trees. Then TinÃ³viel in her amaze followed not straightway, for she understood not his words at once, and knowing she could not run or leap so hardily as her brother she slipped suddenly down among the white hemlocks and hid herself beneath a very tall flower with many spreading leaves; and here she looked in her white raiment like a spatter of moonlight shimmering through the leaves upon the floor.

Then Beren was sad, for he was lonely and was grieved at their fright, and he looked for TinÃ³viel everywhere about, thinking her not fled. Thus suddenly did he lay his hand upon her slender arm beneath the leaves, and with a cry she started away from him and flitted as fast as she could in the wan light, in and about the tree-trunks and the hemlock-stalks. The tender touch of her arm made Beren yet more eager than before to find her, and he followed swiftly and yet not swiftly enough, for in the end she escaped him, and reached the dwellings of her father in fear; nor did she dance alone in the woods for many a day after.

This was a great sorrow to Beren, who would not leave those places, hoping to see that fair elfin maiden dance yet again, and he wandered in the wood growing wild and lonely for many a day and searching for TinÃ°viel. By dawn and dusk he sought her, but ever more hopefully when the moon shone bright. At last one night he caught a sparkle afar off, and lo, there she was dancing alone on a little treeless knoll and Dairon was not there. Often and often she came there after and danced and sang to herself, and sometimes Dairon would be nigh, and then Beren watched from the woodâs edge afar, and sometimes he was away and Beren crept then closer. Indeed for long TinÃ°viel knew of his coming and feigned otherwise, and for long her fear had departed by reason of the wistful hunger of his face lit by the moonlight; and she saw that he was kind and in love with her beautiful dancing.

Then Beren took to following TinÃ°viel secretly through the woods even to the entrance of the cave and the bridgeâs head, and when she was gone in he would cry across the stream, softly saying âTinÃ°vielâ, for he had caught the name from Daironâs lips; and although he knew it not TinÃ°viel often hearkened from within the shadows of the cavernous doors and laughed softly or smiled. At length one day as she danced alone he stepped out more boldly and said to her: âTinÃ°viel, teach me to dance.â âWho art thou?â said she. âBeren. I am from across the Bitter Hills.â âThen if thou wouldst dance, follow me,â said the maiden, and she danced before Beren away, and away into the woods, nimbly and yet not so fast that he could not follow, and ever and anon she would look back and laugh at him stumbling after, saying âDance, Beren, dance! as they dance beyond the Bitter Hills!â In this way they came by winding paths to the abode of Tinwelint, and TinÃ°viel beckoned Beren beyond the stream, and he followed her wondering down into the cave and the deep halls of her home.

When however Beren found himself before the king he was abashed, and of the stateliness of Queen Gwendeling he was in great awe, and behold when the king said: "Who art thou that stumbleth into my halls unbidden?" he had nought to say. TinÃºviel answered therefore for him, saying: "This, my father, is Beren, a wanderer from beyond the hills, and he would learn to dance as the Elves of Artanor can dance," and she laughed, but the king frowned when he heard whence Beren came, and he said: "Put away thy light words, my child, and say has this wild Elf of the shadows sought to do thee any harm?"

"Nay, father," said she, "and I think there is not evil in his heart at all, and be thou not harsh with him, unless thou desirest to see thy daughter TinÃºviel weep, for more wonder has he at my dancing than any that I have known." Therefore said Tinwelint now: "O Beren son of the Noldoli, what dost thou desire of the Elves of the wood ere thou returnest whence thou camest?"

So great was the amazed joy of Beren's heart when TinÃºviel spake thus for him to her father that his courage rose within him, and his adventurous spirit that had brought him out of HisilÃºmÃ« and over the Mountains of Iron awoke again, and looking boldly upon Tinwelint he said: "Why, O king, I desire thy daughter TinÃºviel, for she is the fairest and most sweet of all maidens I have seen or dreamed of."

Then was there a silence in the hall, save that Dairon laughed, and all who heard were astounded, but TinÃºviel cast down her eyes, and the king glancing at the wild and rugged aspect of Beren burst also into laughter, whereat Beren flushed for shame, and TinÃºviel's heart was sore for him. "Why! wed my TinÃºviel fairest of the maidens of the world, and become a prince of the woodland Elvesâtis but a little boon for a stranger to ask," quoth Tinwelint. "Haply I may with right ask somewhat in return. Nothing great shall it be, a token only of thy esteem. Bring me a Silmaril from the Crown of Melko, and that day TinÃºviel weds thee, and she will."

Then all in that place knew that the king treated the matter as an uncouth jest, having pity on the Gnome, and they smiled, for the fame of the Silmarils of FÃ«anor was now great throughout the world, and the Noldoli had told tales of them, and many that had escaped from Angamandi had seen them now blazing lustrous in the iron crown of Melko. Never did this crown leave his head, and he treasured those jewels as his eyes, and no one in the world, or fay or elf or man, could hope ever to set finger even on them and live. This indeed did Beren know, and he guessed the meaning of their mocking smiles, and aflame with anger he cried: âNay, but âtis too small a gift to the father of so sweet a bride. Strange nonetheless seem to me the customs of the woodland Elves, like to the rude laws of the folk of Men, that thou shouldst name the gift unoffered, yet lo! I Beren, a huntsman of the Noldoli,⁴ will fulfil thy small desire,â and with that he burst from the hall while all stood astonished; but TinÃviel wept suddenly. âTwas ill done, O my father,â she cried, âto send one to his death with thy sorry jestingâfor now methinks he will attempt the deed, being maddened by thy scorn, and Melko will slay him, and none will look ever again with such love upon my dancing.â

Then said the king: âTwill not be the first of Gnomes that Melko has slain and for less reason. It is well for him that he lies not bound here in grievous spells for his trespass in my halls and for his insolent speechâ yet Gwendeling said nought, neither did she chide TinÃviel or question her sudden weeping for this unknown wanderer.

Beren however going from before the face of Tinwelint was carried by his wrath far through the woods, until he drew nigh to the lower hills and treeless lands that warned of the approach of the bleak Iron Mountains. Only then did he feel his weariness and stay his march, and thereafter did his greater travails begin. Nights of deep despondency were his and he saw no hope whatever in his quest, and indeed there was little, and soon, as he followed the Iron Mountains till he drew nigh to the terrible regions of Melkoâs abode, the greatest fears assailed him. Many poisonous snakes were in those places and wolves roamed about, and more fearsome still were the wandering bands of the goblins and the Orcsâfoul broodlings of Melko who fared abroad doing his evil work, snaring and capturing beasts, and Men, and Elves, and dragging them to their lord.

Many times was Beren near to capture by the Orcs, and once he escaped the jaws of a great wolf only after a combat wherein he was armed but with an ashen club, and other perils and adventures did he know each day of his wandering to Angamandi. Hunger and thirst too tortured him often, and often he would have turned back had not that been well nigh as perilous as going on; but the voice of TinÃ²viel pleading with Tinwelint echoed in his heart, and at night time it seemed to him that his heart heard her sometimes weeping softly for him far away in the woodlands of her home:âand this was indeed true.

One day he was driven by great hunger to search amid a deserted camping of some Orcs for scraps of food, but some of these returned unawares and took him prisoner, and they tormented him but did not slay him, for their captain seeing his strength, worn though he was with hardships, thought that Melko might perchance be pleased if he was brought before him and might set him to some heavy thrall-work in his mines or in his smithies. So came it that Beren was dragged before Melko, and he bore a stout heart within him nonetheless, for it was a belief among his fatherâs kindred that the power of Melko would not abide for ever, but the Valar would hearken at last to the tears of the Noldoli, and would arise and bind Melko and open Valinor once more to the weary Elves, and great joy should come back upon Earth.

Melko however looking upon him was wroth, asking how a Gnome, a thrall by birth of his, had dared to fare away into the woods unbidden, but Beren answered that he was no runagate but came of a kindred of Gnomes that dwelt in Aryador and mingled much there among the folk of Men. Then was Melko yet more angry, for he sought ever to destroy the friendship and intercourse of Elves and Men, and said that evidently here was a plotter of deep treacheries against Melkoâs lordship, and one worthy of the tortures of the Balrogs; but Beren seeing his peril answered: âThink not, O most mighty Ainu Melko, Lord of the World, that this can be true, for an it were then should I not be here unaided and alone. No friendship has Beren son of Egnor for the kindred of Men; nay indeed, wearying utterly of the lands infested by that folk he has wandered out of Aryador. Many a great tale has my father made to me aforetime of thy splendour and glory, wherefore, albeit I am no renegade thrall, I do desire nothing so much as to serve thee in what small manner I may,â and Beren said therewith that he was a great trapper of small animals and a snarer of birds, and had become lost in the hills in these pursuits until after much wandering he had come into strange lands, and even had not the Orcs seized him he would indeed have had no other rede of safety but to approach the majesty of Ainu Melko and beg him to grant him some humble officeâas a winner of meats for his table perchance.

Now the Valar must have inspired that speech, or perchance it was a spell of cunning words cast on him in compassion by Gwendeling, for indeed it saved his life, and Melko marking his hardy frame believed him, and was willing to accept him as a thrall of his kitchens. Flattery savoured ever sweet in the nostrils of that Ainu, and for all his unfathomed wisdom many a lie of those whom he despised deceived him, were they clothed sweetly in words of praise; therefore now he gave orders for Beren to be made a thrall of Tevildo Prince of Cats*. Now Tevildo was a mighty catâthe mightiest of allâand possessed of an evil sprite, as some say, and he was in Melkoâs constant following; and that cat had all cats subject to him, and he and his subjects were the chasers and getters of meat for Melkoâs table and for his frequent feasts. Wherefore is it that there is hatred still between the Elves and all cats even now when Melko rules no more, and his beasts are become of little account.

When therefore Beren was led away to the halls of Tevildo, and these were not utterly distant from the place of Melkoâs throne, he was much afraid, for he had not looked for such a turn in things, and those halls were ill-lighted and were full of growling and of monstrous purrings in the dark. All about shone catsâ eyes glowing like green lamps or red or yellow where Tevildoâs thanes sat waving and lashing their beautiful tails, but Tevildo himself sat at their head and he was a mighty cat and coal-black and evil to look upon. His eyes were long and very narrow and slanted, and gleamed both red and green, but his great grey whiskers were as stout and as sharp as needles. His purr was like the roll of drums and his growl like thunder, but when he yelled in wrath it turned the blood cold, and indeed small beasts and birds were frozen as to stone, or dropped lifeless often at the very sound. Now Tevildo seeing Beren narrowed his eyes until they seemed to shut, and said: âI smell dogâ, and he took dislike to Beren from that moment. Now Beren had been a lover of hounds in his own wild home.

âWhy,â said Tevildo, âdo ye dare to bring such a creature before me, unless perchance it is to make meat of him?â But those who led Beren said: "Nay, 'twas the word of Melko that this unhappy Elf wear out his life as a catcher of beasts and birds in Tevildo's employ." Then indeed did Tevildo screech in scorn and said: "Then in sooth was my lord asleep or his thoughts were settled elsewhere, for what use think ye is a child of the Eldar to aid the Prince of Cats and his thanes in the catching of birds or of beasts? As well had ye brought some clumsy-footed Man, for none are there either of Elves or Men that can vie with us in our pursuit." Nonetheless he set Beren to a test, and he bade him go catch three mice, "for my hall is infested with them," said he. This indeed was not true, as might be imagined, yet a certain few there were—very wild, evil, and magic kind that dared to dwell there in dark holes, but they were larger than rats and very fierce, and Tevildo harboured them for his own private sport and suffered not their numbers to dwindle.

Three days did Beren hunt them, but having nothing wherewith to devise a trap (and indeed he did not lie to Melko saying that he had cunning in such contrivances) he hunted in vain getting nothing better than a bitten finger for all his labour. Then was Tevildo scornful and in great anger, but Beren got no harm of him or his thanes at that time because of Melko's bidding other than a few scratches. Evil however were his days thereafter in the dwellings of Tevildo. They made him a scullion, and his days passed miserably in the washing of floors and vessels, in the scrubbing of tables and the hewing of wood and the drawing of water. Often too would he be set to the turning of spits whereon birds and fat mice were daintily roasted for the cats, yet seldom did he get food or sleep himself, and he became haggard and unkempt, and wished often that never straying out of HisilÃ³mÃ© he had not even caught sight of the vision of TinÃ©viel.

Â

Now that fair maiden wept for a very great while after Beren's departure and danced no more about the woods, and Dairon grew angry and could not understand her, but she had grown to love the face of Beren peeping through the branches and the crackle of his feet as they followed her through the wood; and his voice that called wistfully "TinÃ©viel, TinÃ©viel" across the stream before her father's doors she longed to hear again, and she would not now dance when Beren was fled to the evil halls of Melko and maybe had already perished. So bitter did this thought become at last that that most tender maiden went to her mother, for to her father she dared not go nor even suffer him to see her weep.

“O Gwendeling, my mother,” said she, “tell me of thy magic, if thou canst, how doth Beren fare. Is all yet well with him?”
“Nay,” said Gwendeling. “He lives indeed, but in an evil captivity, and hope is dead in his heart, for behold, he is a slave in the power of Tevildo Prince of Cats.”

“Then,” said Tinwiel, “I must go and succour him, for none else do I know that will.”

Now Gwendeling laughed not, for in many matters she was wise, and forewise, yet it was a thing unthought in a mad dream that any Elf, still less a maiden, the daughter of the king, should fare untended to the halls of Melko, even in those earlier days before the Battle of Tears when Melko's power had not grown great and he veiled his designs and spread his net of lies. Wherefore did Gwendeling softly bid her not to speak such folly; but Tinwiel said: “Then must thou plead with my father for aid, that he send warriors to Angamandi and demand the freedom of Beren from Ainu Melko.”

This indeed did Gwendeling do, of love for her daughter, and so wroth was Tinwelint that Tinwiel wished that never had her desire been made known; and Tinwelint bade her nor speak nor think of Beren more, and swore he would slay him as he trod those halls again. Now then Tinwiel pondered much what she might do, and going to Dairon she begged him to aid her, or indeed to fare away with her to Angamandi as he would; but Dairon thought with little love of Beren, and he said: “Wherefore should I go into the direst peril that there is in the world for the sake of a wandering Gnome of the woods? Indeed I have no love for him, for he has destroyed our play together, our music and our dancing.” But Dairon moreover told the king of what Tinwiel had desired of him—and this he did not of ill intent but fearing lest Tinwiel fare away to her death in the madness of her heart.

Now⁵ when Tinwelint heard this he called Tinwiel and said: “Wherefore, O maiden of mine, does thou not put this folly away from thee, and seek to do my bidding?â But TinÃviel would not answer, and the king bade her promise him that neither would she think more on Beren, nor would she seek in her folly to follow after him to the evil lands whether alone or tempting any of his folk with her. But TinÃviel said that the first she would not promise and the second only in part, for she would not tempt any of the folk of the woodlands to go with her.

Then was her father mightily angry, and beneath his anger not a little amazed and afraid, for he loved TinÃviel; but this was the plan he devised, for he might not shut his daughter for ever in the caverns where only a dim and flickering light ever came. Now above the portals of his cavernous hall was a steep slope falling to the river, and there grew mighty beeches; and one there was that was named Hirilorn, the Queen of Trees, for she was very mighty, and so deeply cloven was her bole that it seemed as if three shafts sprang from the ground together and they were of like size, round and straight, and their grey rind was smooth as silk, unbroken by branch or twig for a very great height above menâs heads.

Now Tinwelint let build high up in that strange tree, as high as men could fashion their longest ladders to reach, a little house of wood, and it was above the first branches and was sweetly veiled in leaves. Now that house had three corners and three windows in each wall, and at each corner was one of the shafts of Hirilorn. There then did Tinwelint bid TinÃviel dwell until she would consent to be wise, and when she fared up the ladders of tall pine these were taken from beneath and no way had she to get down again. All that she required was brought to her, and folk would scale the ladders and give her food or whatever else she wished for, and then descending again take away the ladders, and the king promised death to any who left one leaning against the tree or who should try by stealth to place one there at night. A guard therefore was set nigh the treeâs foot, and yet came Dairon often thither in sorrow at what he had brought to pass, for he was lonely without TinÃviel; but TinÃviel had at first much pleasure in her house among the leaves, and would gaze out of her little window while Dairon made his sweetest melodies beneath.

But one night a dream of the Valar came to TinÃviel and she dreamt of Beren, and her heart said: âLet me be gone to seek him whom all others have forgotâ and waking, the moon was shining through the trees, and she pondered very deeply how she might escape. Now TinÃ°viel daughter of Gwendeling was not ignorant of magics or of spells, as may well be believed, and after much thought she devised a plan. The next day she asked those who came to her to bring, if they would, some of the clearest water of the stream below, âbut this,â she said, âmust be drawn at midnight in a silver bowl, and brought to my hand with no word spoken,â and after that she desired wine to be brought, âbut this,â she said, âmust be borne hither in a flagon of gold at noon, and he who brings it must sing as he comes,â and they did as they were bid, but Tinwelint was not told.

Then said TinÃ°viel, âGo now to my mother and say to her that her daughter desires a spinning wheel to pass her weary hours,â but Dairon secretly she begged fashion her a tiny loom, and he did this even in the little house of TinÃ°viel in the tree. âBut wherewith will you spin and wherewith weave?â said he; and TinÃ°viel answered: âWith spells and magics,â but Dairon knew not her design, nor said more to the king or to Gwendeling.

Now TinÃ°viel took the wine and water when she was alone, and singing a very magical song the while, she mingled them together, and as they lay in the bowl of gold she sang a song of growth, and as they lay in the bowl of silver she sang another song, and the names of all the tallest and longest things upon Earth were set in that song; the beards of the Indravangs, the tail of Karkaras, the body of Glorund, the bole of Hirilorn, and the sword of Nan she named, nor did she forget the chain Angainu that AulÃ« and Tulkas made or the neck of Gilim the giant, and last and longest of all she spake of the hair of Uinen the lady of the sea that is spread through all the waters. Then did she lave her head with the mingled water and wine, and as she did so she sang a third song, a song of uttermost sleep, and the hair of TinÃ°viel which was dark and finer than the most delicate threads of twilight began suddenly to grow very fast indeed, and after twelve hours had passed it nigh filled the little room, and then TinÃ°viel was very pleased and she lay down to rest; and when she awoke the room was full as with a black mist and she was deep hidden under it, and lo! her hair was trailing out of the windows and blowing about the tree boles in the morning. Then with difficulty she found her little shears and cut the threads of that growth nigh to her head, and after that her hair grew only as it was wont before.

Then was the labour of TinÃ¶viel begun, and though she laboured with the deftness of an Elf long was she spinning and longer weaving still, and did any come and hail her from below she bid them be gone, saying: âI am abed, and desire only to sleep,â and Dairon was much amazed, and called often up to her, but she did not answer.

Now of that cloudy hair TinÃ¶viel wove a robe of misty black soaked with drowsiness more magical far than even that one that her mother had worn and danced in long long ago before the Sun arose, and therewith she covered her garments of shimmering white, and magic slumbers filled the airs about her; but of what remained she twisted a mighty strand, and this she fastened to the bole of the tree within her house, and then was her labour ended, and she looked out of her window westward to the river. Already the sunlight was fading in the trees, and as dusk filled the woods she began a song very soft and low, and as she sung she cast out her long hair from the window so that its slumbrous mist touched the heads and faces of the guards below, and they listening to her voice fell suddenly into a fathomless sleep. Then did TinÃ¶viel clad in her garments of darkness slip down that rope of hair light as a squirrel, and away she danced to the bridge, and before the bridgewards could cry out she was among them dancing; and as the hem of her black robe touched them they fell asleep, and TinÃ¶viel fled very far away as fast as her dancing feet would flit.

Now when the escape of TinÃ¶viel reached the ears of Tinwelint great was his mingled grief and wrath, and all his court was in uproar, and all the woods ringing with the search, but TinÃ¶viel was already far away drawing nigh to the gloomy foothills where the Mountains of Night begin; and âtis said that Dairon following after her became utterly lost, and came never back to Elfinesse, but turned towards Palisor, and there plays⁶ subtle magic musics still, wistful and lonely in the woods and forests of the south.

Yet ere long as TinÃ¶viel went forward a sudden dread overtook her at the thought of what she had dared to do and what lay before; then did she turn back for a while, and she wept, wishing Dairon was with her, and it is said that he indeed was not far off, but was wandering lost in the great pines, the Forest of Night, where afterward TÃ°rin slew Beleg by mishap.⁷ Nigh was TinÃ°viel now to those places, but she entered not that dark region, and regaining heart pressed on, and by reason of the greater magic of her being and because of the spell of wonder and of sleep that fared about her no such dangers assailed her as did Beren before; yet was it a long and evil and weary journey for a maiden to tread.

Now is it to be told to thee, Eriol, that in those days Tevildo had but one trouble in the world, and that was the kindred of the Dogs. Many indeed of these were neither friends nor foes of the Cats, for they had become subject to Melko and were as savage and cruel as any of his animals; indeed from the most cruel and most savage he bred the race of wolves, and they were very dear indeed to him. Was it not the great grey wolf Karkaras Knife-fang, father of wolves, who guarded the gates of Angamandi in those days and long had done so? Many were there however who would neither bow to Melko nor live wholly in fear of him, but dwelt either in the dwellings of Men and guarded them from much evil that had otherwise befallen them or roamed the woods of HisilÃ°mÃ° or passing the mountainous places fared even at times into the region of Artanor and the lands beyond and to the south.

Did ever any of these view Tevildo or any of his thanes or subjects, then there was a great baying and a mighty chase, and albeit seldom was any cat slain by reason of their skill in climbing and in hiding and because of the protecting might of Melko, yet was great enmity between them, and some of those hounds were held in dread among the cats. None however did Tevildo fear, for he was as strong as any among them, and more agile and more swift save only than Huan Captain of Dogs. So swift was Huan that on a time he had tasted the fur of Tevildo, and though Tevildo had paid him for that with a gash from his great claws, yet was the pride of the Prince of Cats unappeased and he lusted to do a great harm to Huan of the Dogs.

Great therefore was the good fortune that befell TinÃ°viel in meeting with Huan in the woods, although at first she was mortally afraid and fled. But Huan overtook her in two leaps, and speaking soft and deep the tongue of the Lost Elves he bid her be not afraid, and âWherefore,â said he, âdo I see an Elfin maiden, and one most fair, wandering alone so nigh to the abodes of the Ainu of Evil? Knowst thou not these are very evil places to be in, little one, even with a companion, and they are death to the lonely?â

âThat know I,â said she, âand I am not here for the love of wayfaring, but I seek only Beren.â

âWhat knowest thou then,â said Huan, âof Berenâor indeed meanest thou Beren son of the huntsman of the Elves, Egnor bo-Rimion, a friend of mine since very ancient days?â

âNay, I know not even whether my Beren be thy friend, for I seek only Beren from beyond the Bitter Hills, whom I knew in the woods near to my fatherâs home. Now is he gone, and my mother Gwendeling says of her wisdom that he is a thrall in the cruel house of Tevildo Prince of Cats; and whether this be true or yet worse be now befallen him I do not know, and I go to discover himâthough plan I have none.â

âThen will I make thee one,â said Huan, âbut do thou trust in me, for I am Huan of the Dogs, chief foe of Tevildo. Rest thee now with me a while within the shadows of the wood, and I will think deeply.â

Then TinÃviel did as he said, and indeed she slept long while Huan watched, for she was very weary. But after a while awakening she said: âLo, I have tarried over long. Come, what is thy thought, O Huan?â

And Huan said: âA dark and difficult matter is this, and no other rede can I devise but this. Creep now if thou hast the heart to the abiding place of that Prince while the sun is high, and Tevildo and the most of his household drowze upon the terraces before his gates. There discover in what manner thou mayst whether Beren be indeed within, as thy mother said to thee. Now I will lie not far hence in the woods, and thou wilt do me a pleasure and aid thy own desires an going before Tevildo, be Beren there or be he not, thou tellest him how thou hast stumbled upon Huan of the Dogs lying sick in the woods at this place. Do not indeed direct him hither, for thou must guide him, if it may be, thyself. Then wilt thou see what I contrive for thee and for Tevildo. Methinks that bearing such tidings Tevildo will not entreat thee ill within his halls nor seek to hold thee there.â

In this way did Huan design both to do Tevildo a hurt, or perchance if it might so be to slay him, and to aid Beren whom he guessed in truth to be that Beren son of Egnor whom the hounds of HisilÃ³mÃ« loved. Indeed hearing the name of Gwendeling and knowing thereby that this maiden was a princess of the woodland fairies he was eager to aid her, and his heart warmed to her sweetness.

Now TinÃºviel taking heart stole near to the halls of Tevildo, and Huan wondered much at her courage, following unknown to her, as far as he might for the success of his design. At length however she passed beyond his sight, and leaving the shelter of the trees came to a region of long grass dotted with bushes that sloped ever upward toward a shoulder of the hills. Now upon that rocky spur the sun shone, but over all the hills and mountains at its back a black cloud brooded, for there was Angamandi; and TinÃºviel fared on not daring to look up at that gloom, for fear oppressed her, and as she went the ground rose and the grass grew more scant and rock-strewn until it came even to a cliff, sheer of one side, and there upon a stony shelf was the castle of Tevildo. No pathway led thereto, and the place where it stood fell towards the woods in terrace after terrace so that none might reach its gates save by many great leaps, and those became ever steeper as the castle drew more nigh. Few were the windows of the house and upon the ground there were noneâ€”indeed the very gate was in the air where in the dwellings of Men are wont to be the windows of the upper floor; but the roof had many wide and flat spaces open to the sun.

Now does TinÃºviel wander disconsolate upon the lowest terrace and look in dread at the dark house upon the hill, when behold, she came at a bend in the rock upon a lone cat lying in the sun and seemingly asleep. As she approached he opened a yellow eye and blinked at her, and thereupon rising and stretching he stepped up to her and said: â€œWhither away, little maidâ€”dost not know that you trespass on the sunning ground of his highness Tevildo and his thanes?â€

Now TinÃºviel was very much afraid, but she made as bold an answer as she was able, saying: â€œThat know I, my lordâ€”and this pleased the old cat greatly, for he was in truth only Tevildoâ€™s doorkeeperâ€”but I would indeed of your goodness be brought to Tevildoâ€™s presence nowâ€”nay, even if he sleeps,â€ said she, for the doorkeeper lashed his tail in astonished refusal. â€œI have words of immediate import for his private ear. Lead me to him, my lord,â€

she pleaded, and thereat the cat purred so loudly that she dared to stroke his ugly head, and this was much larger than her own, being greater than that of any dog that is now on Earth. Thus entreated, Umuiyan, for such was his name, said: "Come then with me," and seizing TinÃviel suddenly by her garments at the shoulder to her great terror he tossed her upon his back and leaped upon the second terrace. There he stopped, and as TinÃviel scrambled from his back he said: "Well is it for thee that this afternoon my lord Tevildo lieth upon this lowly terrace far from his house, for a great weariness and a desire for sleep has come upon me, so that I fear me I should not be willing to carry thee much farther" now TinÃviel was robed in her robe of sable mist.

So saying Umuiyan* yawned mightily and stretched himself before he led her along that terrace to an open space, where upon a wide couch of baking stones lay the horrible form of Tevildo himself, and both his evil eyes were shut. Going up to him the doorcat Umuiyan spoke in his ear softly, saying: "A maiden awaits thy pleasure, my lord, who hath news of importance to deliver to thee, nor would she take my refusal." Then did Tevildo angrily lash his tail, half opening an eye "What is it" he swift, said he, "for this is no hour to come desiring audience of Tevildo Prince of Cats."

"Nay, lord," said TinÃviel trembling, "be not angry; nor do I think that thou wilt when thou hearest, yet is the matter such that it were better not even whispered here where the breezes blow," and TinÃviel cast a glance as it were of apprehension toward the woods.

"Nay, get thee gone," said Tevildo, "thou smellest of dog, and what news of good came ever to a cat from a fairy that had had dealings with the dogs?"

"Why, sir, that I smell of dogs is no matter of wonder, for I have just escaped from one" and it is indeed of a certain very mighty dog whose name thou knowest that I would speak." Then up sat Tevildo and opened his eyes, and he looked all about him, and stretched three times, and at last bade the doorcat lead TinÃviel within; and Umuiyan caught her upon his back as before. Now was TinÃviel in the sorest dread, for having gained what she desired, a chance of entering Tevildo's stronghold and maybe of discovering whether Beren were there, she had no plan more, and knew not what would become of herâindeed had she been able she would have fled; yet now do those cats begin to ascend the terraces towards the castle, and one leap does Umuiyan make bearing TinÃviel upwards and then another, and at the third he stumbled so that TinÃviel cried out in fear, and Tevildo said: âWhat ails thee, Umuiyan, thou clumsy-foot? It is time that thou left my employ if age creeps on thee so swiftly.â But Umuiyan said: âNay, lord, I know not what it is, but a mist is before mine eyes and my head is heavy,â and he staggered as one drunk, so that TinÃviel slid from his back, and thereupon he laid him down as if in a dead sleep; but Tevildo was wroth and seized TinÃviel and none too gently, and himself bore her to the gates. Then with a mighty leap he sprang within, and bidding that maiden alight he set up a yell that echoed fearsomely in the dark ways and passages. Forthwith they hastened to him from within, and some he bid descend to Umuiyan and bind him and cast him from the rocks âon the northern side where they fall most sheer, for he is of no use more to me,â he said, âfor age has robbed him of his sureness of footâ and TinÃviel quaked to hear the ruthlessness of this beast. But even as he spake he himself yawned and stumbled as with a sudden drowsiness, and he bid others to lead TinÃviel away to a certain chamber within, and that was the one where Tevildo was accustomed to sit at meat with his greatest thanes. It was full of bones and smelt evilly; no windows were there and but one door; but a hatchway gave from it upon the great kitchens, and a red light crept thence and dimly lit the place.

Now so adread was TinÃviel when those catfolk left her there that she stood a moment unable to stir, but soon becoming used to the darkness she looked about and espying the hatchway that had a wide sill she sprang thereto, for it was not over high and she was a nimble Elf. Now gazing therethrough, for it was ajar, she saw the wide vaulted kitchens and the great fires that burnt there, and those that toiled always within, and the most were catsâbut behold, there by a great fire stooped Beren, and he was grimed with labour, and TinÃviel sat and wept, but as yet dared nothing. Indeed even as she sat the harsh voice of Tevildo sounded suddenly within that chamber: âNay, where then in Melkoâs name has that mad Elf fled,â and TinÃviel hearing shrank against the wall, but Tevildo caught sight of her where she was perched and cried: "Then the little bird sings not any more; come down or I must fetch thee, for behold, I will not encourage the Elves to seek audience of me in mockery."

Then partly in fear, and part in hope that her clear voice might carry even to Beren, TinÃ¶viel began suddenly to speak very loud and to tell her tale so that the chambers rang; but "Hush, dear maiden," said Tevildo, "if the matter were secret without it is not one for bawling within." Then said TinÃ¶viel: "Speak not thus to me, O cat, mighty Lord of Cats though thou be, for am I not TinÃ¶viel Princess of Fairies that have stepped out of my way to do thee a pleasure?" Now at those words, and she had shouted them even louder than before, a great crash was heard in the kitchens as of a number of vessels of metal and earthenware let suddenly fall, but Tevildo snarled: "There trippeth that fool Beren the Elf. Melko rid me of such folk!" Yet TinÃ¶viel, guessing that Beren had heard and been smitten with astonishment, put aside her fears and repented her daring no longer. Tevildo nonetheless was very wroth at her haughty words, and had he not been minded first to discover what good he might get from her tale, it had fared ill with TinÃ¶viel straightway. Indeed from that moment was she in great peril, for Melko and all his vassals held Tinwelint and his folk as outlaws, and great was their joy to ensnare them and cruelly entreat them, so that much favour would Tevildo have gained had he taken TinÃ¶viel before his lord. Indeed, so soon as she named herself, this did he purpose to do when his own business had been done, but of a truth his wits were drowzed that day, and he forgot to marvel more why TinÃ¶viel sat perched upon the sill of the hatchway; nor did he think more of Beren, for his mind was bent only to the tale TinÃ¶viel bore to him. Wherefore said he, dissembling his evil mood, "Nay, Lady, be not angry, but come, delay whetteth my desire" what is it that thou hast for my ears, for they twitch already."

But TinÃ¶viel said: "There is a great beast, rude and violent, and his name is Huan" and at that name Tevildo's back curved, and his hair bristled and crackled, and the light of his eyes was red" and," she went on, "it seems to me a shame that such a brute be suffered to infest the woods so nigh even to the abode of the powerful Prince of Cats, my lord Tevildo" but Tevildo said: "Nor is he suffered, and cometh never there save it be by

62
 A
 "Now therefore said Galton we must go as far hence toward the Eucalyptus Mountains as the Dawn came upon us, and halt given us great space of time albeit it is winter thereof rose a discussion for a member said that it were better to make for Criston and Thor supposed. "The Sun say thy will be up long ere we can hit the hills and we shall be embled in the plain of those strokes and those seasons; how may a host be sent as we have in the hills?
 And some would have yet more time in making for Rad Ustren the way of Escape now for the led us into Rad Ustren the way of Escape for that is but half the journey, and our weary and our wounded may hope to come to safety no further

63
 A
 But Galton, led Gove Legolas Greenleaf of his house in Tree which knew all that plain by day by dark and with night-sighted made ~~and~~ ^{and} for all their ~~and~~ ^{and} warnings over the vale, and halted only after a great while. Then was all the Earth shrouded with the grey light of that sad dawn which had shrouded the beauty of Gondolin. But the plain was full of mist and there was a marvel for the mist did come from east, before, and from the west, and did with the dews of the fountain of the King. Again the rose and covered by the vapours of the long past of dawn in safety, but the vapours already there, as for any light of day there was in the air from the hills or from the ruined walls.
 Now the Mountains were in that side Seven leagues save an mile from Gondolin and Criston the Clinging Eagles, and the leaves of the forest came from the beginning of the Mountains from the west, and now yet two leagues and part of a third from the pass, and very weary the folk. By now the Sun hung ~~and she was very red and great; and the mists with her were~~ red, but the mists of Gondolin were utterly hidden as in a cloud.
 Behind the at the chamo of the cars he saw but half a league away a knot of men that fled on foot and these were pursued by a horse cavalry, for on great wolves rode the Orcs, as they looked grandish spears. Then Thor! Lo! there is the rider my son and my men in the mist and he is in the straits. Forthwith he chose fifty of his men that were best weary, and leading the main company to follow, he

A page from the tale of The Fall of Gondolin

Now all this that Tināviel spake was a great lie in whose devising Huan had guided her, and maidens of the Eldar are not wont to fashion lies; yet have I never heard that any of the Eldar blamed her therein nor Beren afterward, and neither do I, for Tevildo was an evil cat and Melko the wickedest of all beings, and Tināviel was in dire peril at their hands. Tevildo however, himself a great and skilled liar, was so deeply versed in the lies and subtleties of all the beasts and creatures that he seldom knew whether to believe what was said to him or not, and was wont to disbelieve all things save those he wished to believe true, and so was he often deceived by the more honest. Now the story of Huan and his helplessness so pleased him that he was fain to believe it true, and determined at least to test it; yet at first he feigned indifference, saying this was a small matter for such secrecy and might have been spoken outside without further ado. But TinÃ©viel said she had not thought that Tevildo Prince of Cats needed to learn that the ears of Huan heard the slightest sounds a league away, and the voice of a cat further than any sound else.

Now therefore Tevildo sought to discover from TinÃ©viel under pretence of mistrusting her tale where exactly Huan might be found, but she made only vague answers, seeing in this her only hope of escaping from the castle, and at length Tevildo, overcome by curiosity and threatening evil things if she should prove false, summoned two of his thanes to him, and one was Oikeroi, a fierce and warlike cat. Then did the three set out with TinÃ©viel from that place, but TinÃ©viel took off her magical garment of black and folded it, so that for all its size and density it appeared no more than the smallest kerchief (for so was she able), and thus was she borne down the terraces upon the back of Oikeroi without mishap, and no drowsiness assailed her bearer. Now crept they through the woods in the direction she had named, and soon does Tevildo smell dog and bristles and lashes his great tail, but after he climbs a lofty tree and looks down from thence into that dale that TinÃ©viel had shown to them. There he does indeed see the great form of Huan lying prostrate groaning and moaning, and he comes down in much glee and haste, and indeed in his eagerness he forgets TinÃ©viel, who now in great fear for Huan lies hidden in a bank of fern. The design of Tevildo and his two companions was to enter that dale silently from different quarters and so come all suddenly upon Huan unawares and slay him, or if he were too stricken to make fight to make sport of him and torment him. This did they now, but even as they leapt out upon him Huan sprang up into the air with a mighty baying, and his jaws closed in the back close to the neck of that cat Oikeroi, and Oikeroi died; but the other thane fled howling up a great tree, and so was Tevildo left alone face to face with Huan, and such an encounter was not much to his mind, yet was Huan upon him too swiftly for flight, and they fought fiercely in that glade, and the noise that Tevildo made was very hideous; but at length Huan had him by the throat, and that cat might well have perished had not his claws as he struck out blindly pierced Huan's eye. Then did Huan give tongue, and Tevildo screeching fearsomely got himself loose with a great wrench and leapt up a tall and smooth tree that stood by, even as his companion had done. Despite his grievous hurt Huan now leaps beneath that tree baying mightily, and Tevildo curses him and casts evil words upon him from above.

Then said Huan: "Lo, Tevildo, these are the words of Huan whom thou thoughtest to catch and slay helpless as the miserable mice it is thy wont to hunt—stay for ever up thy lonely tree and bleed to death of thy wounds, or come down and feel again my teeth. But if neither are to thy liking, then tell me where is Tinãviel Princess of Fairies and Beren son of Egnor, for these are my friends. Now these shall be set as ransom against thee—though it be valuing thee far over thy worth."

"As for that cursed Elf, she lies whimpering in the ferns yonder, an my ears mistake not," said Tevildo, "and Beren methinks is being soundly scratched by Miaulã« my cook in the kitchens of my castle for his clumsiness there an hour ago."

"Then let them be given to me in safety," said Huan, "and thou mayest return thyself to thy halls and lick thyself unharmed."

"Of a surety my thane who is here with me shall fetch them for thee," said Tevildo, but growled Huan: "Ay, and fetch also all thy tribe and the hosts of the Orcs and the plagues of Melko. Nay, I am no fool; rather shalt thou give Tinãviel a token and she shall fetch Beren, or thou shalt stay here if thou likest not the other way." Then was Tevildo forced to cast down his golden collar—a token no cat dare dishonour, but Huan said: "Nay, more yet is needed, for this will arouse all thy folk to seek thee," and this Tevildo knew and had hoped. So was it that in the end weariness and hunger and fear prevailed upon that proud cat, a prince of the service of Melko, to reveal the secret of the cats and the spell that Melko had entrusted to him; and those were words of magic whereby the stones of his evil house were held together, and whereby he held all beasts of the catfolk under his sway, filling them with an evil power beyond their nature; for long has it been said that Tevildo was an evil fay in beastlike shape. When therefore he had told it Huan laughed till the woods rang, for he knew that the days of the power of the cats were over.

Now sped TinÃ©viel with the golden collar of Tevildo back to the lowest terrace before the gates, and standing she spake the spell in her clear voice. Then behold, the air was filled with the voices of cats and the house of Tevildo shook; and there came therefrom a host of indwellers and they were shrunk to puny size and were afeared of TinÃ©viel, who waving the collar of Tevildo spake before them certain of the words that Tevildo had said in her hearing to Huan, and they cowered before her. But she said: âLo, let all those of the folk of the Elves or of the children of Men that are bound within these halls be brought forth,â and behold, Beren was brought forth, but of other thralls there were none, save only Gimli, an aged Gnome, bent in thralldom and grown blind, but whose hearing was the keenest that has been in the world, as all songs say. Gimli came leaning upon a stick and Beren aided him, but Beren was clad in rags and haggard, and he had in his hand a great knife he had caught up in the kitchen, fearing some new ill when the house shook and all the voices of the cats were heard; but when he beheld TinÃ©viel standing amid the host of cats that shrank from her and saw the great collar of Tevildo, then was he⁸ amazed utterly, and knew not what to think. But TinÃ©viel was very glad, and spoke saying: âO Beren from beyond the Bitter Hills, wilt thou now dance with meâbut let it not be here.â And she led Beren far away, and all those cats set up a howling and wailing, so that Huan and Tevildo heard it in the woods, but none followed or molested them, for they were afraid, and the magic of Melko was fallen from them.

This indeed they rued afterward when Tevildo returned home followed by his trembling comrade, for Tevildoâs wrath was terrible, and he lashed his tail and dealt blows at all who stood nigh. Now Huan of the dogs, though it might seem a folly, when Beren and TinÃ©viel came to that glade had suffered that evil Prince to return without further war, but the great collar of gold he had set about his own neck, and at this was Tevildo more angry than all else, for a great magic of strength and power lay therein. Little to Huanâs liking was it that Tevildo lived still, but now no longer did he fear the cats, and that tribe has fled before the dogs ever since, and the dogs hold them still in scorn since the humbling of Tevildo in the woods nigh Angamandi; and Huan has not done any greater deed. Indeed afterward Melko heard all and he cursed Tevildo and his folk and banished them, nor have they since that day had lord or master or any friend, and their voices wail and screech for their hearts are very lonely and bitter and full of loss, yet there is only darkness therein and no kindness.

At the time however whereof the tale tells it was Tevildoâs chief desire to recapture Beren and TinÃºviel and to slay Huan, that he might regain the spell and magic he had lost, for he was in great fear of Melko, and he dared not seek his masterâs aid and reveal his defeat and the betrayal of his spell. Unwitting of this Huan feared those places, and was in great dread lest those doings come swiftly to Melkoâs ear, as did most things that came to pass in the world; wherefore now TinÃºviel and Beren wandered far away with Huan, and they became great in friendship with him, and in that life Beren grew strong again and his thralldom fell from him, and TinÃºviel loved him.

Yet wild and rugged and very lonely were those days, for never a face of Elf or of Man did they see, and TinÃºviel grew at last to long sorely for Gwendeling her mother and the songs of sweet magic she was used to sing to her children as twilight fell in the woodlands by their ancient halls. Often she half fancied she heard the flute of Dairon her brother, in pleasant glades⁹ wherein they sojourned, and her heart grew heavy. At length she said to Beren and to Huan: âI must return home,â and now is it Berenâs heart that is overcast with sorrow, for he loved that life in the woods with the dogs (for by now many others had become joined to Huan), yet not if TinÃºviel were not there.

Nonetheless said he: âNever may I go back with thee to the land of Artanorânor come there ever after to seek thee, sweet TinÃºviel, save only bearing a Silmaril; nor may that ever now be achieved, for am I not a fugitive from the very halls of Melko, and in danger of the most evil pains do any of his servants spy me.â Now this he said in the grief of his heart at parting with TinÃºviel, and she was torn in mind, abiding not the thought of leaving Beren nor yet of living ever thus in exile. So sat she a great while in sad thought and she spoke not, but Beren sat nigh and at length said: âTinÃºviel, one thing only can we doâgo get a Silmarilâ and she sought thereupon Huan, asking his aid and advice, but he was very grave and saw nothing but folly in the matter. Yet in the end TinÃviel begged of him the fell of Oikeroi that he slew in the affray of the glade; now Oikeroi was a very mighty cat and Huan carried that fell with him as a trophy.

Now doth TinÃviel put forth her skill and fairy-magic, and she sews Beren into this fell and makes him to the likeness of a great cat, and she teaches him how to sit and sprawl, to step and bound and trot in the semblance of a cat, till Huanâs very whiskers bristled at the sight, and thereat Beren and TinÃviel laughed. Never however could Beren learn to screech or wail or to purr like any cat that ever walked, nor could TinÃviel awaken a glow in the dead eyes of the catskinâbut we must put up with that,âsaid she, âand thou hast the air of a very noble cat if thou but hold thy tongue.â

Then did they bid farewell to Huan and set out for the halls of Melko by easy journeys, for Beren was in great discomfort and heat within the fur of Oikeroi, and TinÃvielâs heart became lighter awhile than it had been for long, and she stroked Beren or pulled his tail, and Beren was angry because he could not lash it in answer as fiercely as he wished. At length however they drew near to Angamandi, as indeed the rumblings and deep noises, and the sound of mighty hammerings of ten thousand smiths labouring unceasingly, declared to them. Nigh were the sad chambers where the thrall-Noldoli laboured bitterly under the Orcs and goblins of the hills, and here the gloom and darkness was great so that their hearts fell, but TinÃviel arrayed her once more in her dark garment of deep sleep. Now the gates of Angamandi were of iron wrought hideously and set with knives and spikes, and before them lay the greatest wolf the world has ever seen, even Karkaras Knife-fang who had never slept; and Karkaras growled when he saw TinÃviel approach, but of the cat he took not much heed, for he thought little of cats and they were ever passing in and out.

âGrowl not, O Karkaras,âsaid she, âfor I go to seek my lord Melko, and thisthane of Tevildo goeth with me as escort.âNow the dark robe veiled all her shimmering beauty, and Karkaras was not much troubled in mind, yet nonetheless he approached as was his wont to snuff the air of her, and the sweet fragrance of the Eldar that garment might not hide. Therefore straightway did

TinÃ°viel begin a magic dance, and the black strands of her dark veil she cast in his eyes so that his legs shook with a drowsiness and he rolled over and was asleep. But not until he was fast in dreams of great chases in the woods of HisilÃ³mÃ« when he was yet a whelp did TinÃ°viel cease, and then did those twain enter that black portal, and winding down many shadowy ways they stumbled at length into the very presence of Melko.

In that gloom Beren passed well enough as a very thane of Tevildo, and indeed Oikeroi had aforetime been much about the halls of Melko, so that none heeded him and he slunk under the very chair of the Ainu unseen, but the adders and evil things there lying set him in great fear so that he durst not move.

Now all this fell out most fortunately, for had Tevildo been with Melko their deceit would have been discoveredâand indeed of that danger they had thought, not knowing that Tevildo sat now in his halls and knew not what to do should his discomfiture become noised in Angamandi; but behold, Melko espieth TinÃ°viel and saith: âWho art thou that flittest about my halls like a bat? How camest thou in, for of a surety thou dost not belong here?â

âNay, that I do not yet,â saith TinÃ°viel, âthough I may perchance hereafter, of thy goodness, my lord Melko. Knowest thou not that I am TinÃ°viel daughter of Tinwelint the outlaw, and he hath driven me from his halls, for he is an overbearing Elf and I give not my love at his command.â

Now in truth was Melko amazed that the daughter of Tinwelint came thus of her free will to his dwelling, Angamandi the terrible, and suspecting something untoward he asked what was her desire: âfor knowest thou not,â saith he, âthat there is no love here for thy father or his folk, nor needst thou hope for soft words and good cheer from me.â

âSo hath my father said,â saith she, âbut wherefore need I believe him? Behold, I have a skill of subtle dances, and I would dance now before you, my lord, for then methinks I might readily be granted some humble corner of your halls wherein to dwell until such times as you should call for the little dancer TinÃ°viel to lighten your cares.â

âNay,â saith Melko, âsuch things are little to my mind; but as thou hast come thus far to dance, dance, and after we will see,â and with that he leered horribly, for his dark mind pondered some evil.

Then did TinÃviel begin such a dance as neither she nor any other sprite or fay or elf danced ever before or has done since, and after a while even Melkoâs gaze was held in wonder. Round the hall she fared, swift as a swallow, noiseless as a bat, magically beautiful as only TinÃviel ever was, and now she was at Melkoâs side, now before him, now behind, and her misty draperies touched his face and waved before his eyes, and the folk that sat about the walls or stood in that place were whelmed one by one in sleep, falling down into deep dreams of all that their ill hearts desired.

Beneath his chair the adders lay like stones, and the wolves before his feet yawned and slumbered, and Melko gazed on enchanted, but he did not sleep. Then began TinÃviel to dance a yet swifter dance before his eyes, and even as she danced she sang in a voice very low and wonderful a song which Gwendeling had taught her long ago, a song that the youths and maidens sang beneath the cypresses of the gardens of LÃrien when the Tree of Gold had waned and Silpion was gleaming. The voices of nightingales were in it, and many subtle odours seemed to fill the air of that noisome place as she trod the floor lightly as a feather in the wind; nor has any voice or sight of such beauty ever again been seen there, and Ainu Melko for all his power and majesty succumbed to the magic of that Elf-maid, and indeed even the eyelids of LÃrien had grown heavy had he been there to see. Then did Melko fall forward drowzed, and sank at last in utter sleep down from his chair upon the floor, and his iron crown rolled away.

Suddenly TinÃviel ceased. In the hall no sound was heard save of slumbrous breath; even Beren slept beneath the very seat of Melko, but TinÃviel shook him so that he awoke at last. Then in fear and trembling he tore asunder his disguise and freeing himself from it leapt to his feet. Now does he draw that knife that he had from Tevildoâs kitchens and he seizes the mighty iron crown, but TinÃviel could not move it and scarcely might the thews of Beren avail to turn it. Great is the frenzy of their fear as in that dark hall of sleeping evil Beren labours as noiselessly as may be to prise out a Silmaril with his knife. Now does he loosen the great central jewel and the sweat pours from his brow, but even as he forces it from the crown lo! his knife snaps with a loud crack.

TinÃºviel smothers a cry thereat and Beren springs away with the one Silmaril in his hand, and the sleepers stir and Melko groans as though ill thoughts disturbed his dreams, and a black look comes upon his sleeping face. Content now with that one flashing gem those twain fled desperately from the hall, stumbling wildly down many dark passages till from the glimmering of grey light they knew they neared the gatesâand behold! Karkaras lies across the threshold, awake once more and watchful.

Straightway Beren thrust himself before TinÃºviel although she said him nay, and this proved in the end ill, for TinÃºviel had not time to cast her spell of slumber over the beast again, ere seeing Beren he bared his teeth and growled angrily. âWherefore this surliness, Karkaras?â said TinÃºviel. âWherefore this Gnome¹⁰ who entered not and yet now issueth in haste?â quoth Knife-fang, and with that he leapt upon Beren, who struck straight between the wolfâs eyes with his fist, catching for his throat with the other hand.

Then Karkaras seized that hand in his dreadful jaws, and it was the hand wherein Beren clasped the blazing Silmaril, and both hand and jewel Karkaras bit off and took into his red maw. Great was the agony of Beren and the fear and anguish of TinÃºviel, yet even as they expect to feel the teeth of the wolf a new thing strange and terrible comes to pass. Behold now that Silmaril blazeth with a white and hidden fire of its own nature and is possessed of a fierce and holy magicâfor did it not come from Valinor and the blessed realms, being fashioned with spells of the Gods and Gnomes before evil came there; and it doth not tolerate the touch of evil flesh or of unholy hand. Now cometh it into the foul body of Karkaras, and suddenly that beast is burnt with a terrible anguish and the howling of his pain is ghastly to hear as it echoeth in those rocky ways, so that all that sleeping court within awakes. Then did TinÃºviel and Beren flee like the wind from the gates, yet was Karkaras far before them raging and in madness as a beast pursued by Balrogs; and after when they might draw breath TinÃºviel wept over the maimed arm of Beren kissing it often, so that behold it bled not, and pain left it, and was healed by the tender healing of her love; yet was Beren ever after surnamed among all folk Ermabwed the One-handed, which in the language of the Lonely Isle is Elmvait.

Now however must they bethink them of escape if such may be their fortune, and Tinviel wrapped part of her dark mantle about Beren, and so for a while flitting by dusk and dark amid the hills they were seen by none, albeit Melko had raised all his Orcs of terror against them; and his fury at the rape of that jewel was greater than the Elves had ever seen it yet.

Even so it seems soon to them that the net of the hunters drew ever more tightly upon them, and though they had reached the edge of the more familiar woods and passed the glooms of the forest of Taurfuin, still were there many leagues of peril yet to pass between them and the caverns of the king, and even did they reach ever there it seemed like they would but draw the chase behind them thither and Melko's hate upon all that woodland folk. So great indeed was the hue and cry that Huan learnt of it far away, and he marvelled much at the daring of those twain, and still more that ever they had escaped from Angamandi.

Now goes he with many dogs through the woods hunting Orcs and thanes of Tevildo, and many hurts he got thus, and many of them he slew or put to fear and flight, until one even at dusk the Valar brought him to a glade in that northward region of Artanor that was called afterward Nan Dumgorthin, the land of the dark idols, but that is a matter that concerns not this tale. Howbeit it was even then a dark land and gloomy and foreboding, and dread wandered beneath its lowering trees no less even than in Taurfuin; and those two Elves Tinviel and Beren were lying therein weary and without hope, and Tinviel wept but Beren was fingering his knife.

Now when Huan saw them he would not suffer them to speak or to tell any of their tale, but straightway took Tinviel upon his mighty back and bade Beren run as best he could beside him, for, said he, a great company of the Orcs are drawing swiftly hither, and wolves are their trackers and their scouts. Now doth Huan's pack run about them, and they go very swiftly along quick and secret paths towards the homes of the folk of Tinwelint far away. Thus was it that they eluded the host of their enemies, but had nonetheless many an encounter afterward with wandering things of evil, and Beren slew an Orc that came nigh to dragging off Tinviel, and that was a good deed. Seeing then that the hunt still pressed them close, once more did Huan lead them by winding ways, and dared not yet straightly to bring them to the land of the woodland fairies. So cunning however was his leading that at last after many days the chase fell far away, and no longer did they see or hear anything of the bands of Orcs; no goblins waylaid them nor did the howling of any evil wolves come upon the airs at night, and belike that was because already they had stepped within the circle of Gwendelingâs magic that hid the paths from evil things and kept harm from the regions of the woodelves.

Then did TinÃ°viel breathe freely once more as she had not done since she fled from her fatherâs halls, and Beren rested in the sun far from the glooms of Angband until the last bitterness of thralldom left him. Because of the light falling through green leaves and the whisper of clean winds and the song of birds once more are they wholly unafraid.

At last came there nevertheless a day whereon waking out of a deep slumber Beren started up as one who leaves a dream of happy things coming suddenly to his mind, and he said: âFarewell, O Huan, most trusty comrade, and thou, little TinÃ°viel, whom I love, fare thee well. This only I beg of thee, get thee now straight to the safety of thy home, and may good Huan lead thee. But Iâlo, I must away into the solitude of the woods, for I have lost that Silmaril which I had, and never dare I draw near to Angamandi more, wherefore neither will I enter the halls of Tinwelint.â Then he wept to himself, but TinÃ°viel who was nigh and had hearkened to his musing came beside him and said: âNay, now is my heart changed,¹¹ and if thou dwellest in the woods, O Beren Ermabwed, then so will I, and if thou wilt wander in the wild places there will I wander also, or with thee or after thee:âyet never shall my father see me again save only if thou takest me to him.â Then indeed was Beren glad at her sweet words, and fain would he have dwelt with her as a huntsman of the wild, but his heart smote him for all that she had suffered for him, and for her he put away his pride. Indeed she reasoned with him, saying it would be folly to be stubborn, and that her father would greet them with nought but joy, being glad to see his daughter yet aliveâand âmaybe,â said she, âhe will have shame that his jesting has given thy fair hand to the jaws of Karkaras.â But Huan also she implored to return with them a space, for âmy father owes thee a very great reward, O Huan,â saith she, âan he loves his daughter at all.â

So came it that those three set forward once again together, and came at last back to the woodlands that TinÃ°viel knew and loved nigh to the dwellings of her folk and to the deep halls of her home. Yet even as they approach they find fear and tumult among that people such as had not been for a long age, and asking some that wept before their doors they learned that ever since the day of TinÃ°vielâs secret flight ill-fortune had befallen them. Lo, the king had been distraught with grief and had relaxed his ancient wariness and cunning; indeed his warriors had been sent hither and thither deep into the unwholesome woods searching for that maiden, and many had been slain or lost for ever, and war there was with Melkoâs servants about all their northern and eastern borders, so that the folk feared mightily lest that Ainu upraise his strength and come utterly to crush them and Gwendelingâs magic have not the strength to withhold the numbers of the Orcs. âBehold,â said they, ânow is the worst of all befallen, for long has Queen Gwendeling sat aloof and smiled not nor spoken, looking as it were to a great distance with haggard eyes, and the web of her magic has blown thin about the woods, and the woods are dreary, for Dairon comes not back, neither is his music heard ever in the glades. Behold now the crown of all our evil tidings, for know that there has broken upon us raging from the halls of Evil a great grey wolf filled with an evil spirit, and he fares as though lashed by some hidden madness, and none are safe. Already has he slain many as he runs wildly snapping and yelling through the woods, so that the very banks of the stream that flows before the kingâs halls has become a lurking-place of danger. There comes the awful wolf oftentimes to drink, looking as the evil Prince himself with bloodshot eyes and tongue lolling out, and never can he slake his desire for water as though some inward fire devours him.â

Then was TinÃ°viel sad at the thought of the unhappiness that had come upon her folk, and most of all was her heart bitter at the story of Dairon, for of this she had not heard any murmur before. Yet could she not wish Beren had come never to the lands of Artanor, and together they made haste to Tinwelint; and already to the Elves of the wood it seemed that the evil was at an end now that TinÃºviel was come back among them unharmed. Indeed they scarce had hoped for that.

In great gloom do they find King Tinwelint, yet suddenly is his sorrow melted to tears of gladness, and Gwendeling sings again for joy when TinÃºviel enters there and casting away her raiment of dark mist she stands before them in her pearly radiance of old. For a while all is mirth and wonder in that hall, and yet at length the king turns his eyes to Beren and says: âSo thou hast returned tooâbringing a Silmaril, beyond doubt, in recompense for all the ill thou hast wrought my land; or an thou hast not, I know not wherefore thou art here.â

Then TinÃºviel stamped her foot and cried so that the king and all about him wondered at her new and fearless mood: âFor shame, my fatherâbehold, here is Beren the brave whom thy jesting drove into dark places and foul captivity and the Valar alone saved from a bitter death. Methinks âtwould rather befit a king of the Eldar to reward him than revile him.â

âNay,â said Beren, âthe king thy father hath the right. Lord,â said he, âI have a Silmaril in my hand even now.â

âShow me then,â said the king in amaze.

âThat I cannot,â said Beren, âfor my hand is not hereâ and he held forth his maimed arm.

Then was the kingâs heart turned to him by reason of his stout and courteous demeanour, and he bade Beren and TinÃºviel relate to him all that had befallen either of them, and he was eager to hearken, for he did not fully comprehend the meaning of Berenâs words. When however he had heard all yet more was his heart turned to Beren, and he marvelled at the love that had awakened in the heart of TinÃºviel so that she had done greater deeds and more daring than any of the warriors of his folk.

âNever again,â said he, âO Beren I beg of thee, leave this court nor the side of TinÃºviel, for thou art a great Elf and thy name will ever be great among the kindreds.â Yet Beren answered him proudly, and said: âNay, O King, I hold to my word and thine, and I will get thee that Silmaril or ever I dwell in peace in thy halls.â And the king entreated him to journey no more into the dark and unknown realms, but Beren said: âNo need is there thereof, for behold that jewel is even now nigh to thy caverns,â and he made clear to Tinwelint that that beast that ravaged his land was none other than Karkaras, the wolfward of Melkoâs gatesâand this was not known to all, but Beren knew it taught by Huan, whose cunning in the reading of track and slot was greatest among all the hounds, and therein are none of them unskilled. Huan indeed was with Beren now in the halls, and when those twain spoke of a chase and a great hunt he begged to be in that deed; and it was granted gladly. Now do those three prepare themselves to harry that beast, that all the folk be rid of the terror of the wolf, and Beren kept his word, bringing a Silmaril to shine once more in Elfinesse. King Tinwelint himself led that chase, and Beren was beside him, and Mablung the heavy-handed, chief of the kingâs thanes, leaped up and grasped a spear¹²âa mighty weapon captured in battle with the distant Orcsâand with those three stalked Huan mightiest of dogs, but others they would not take according to the desire of the king, who said: âFour is enough for the slaying even of the Hell-wolfâbut only those who had seen knew how fearsome was that beast, nigh as large as a horse among Men, and so great was the ardour of his breath that it scorched whatsoever it touched. About the hour of sunrise they set forth, and soon after Huan espied a new slot beside the stream, not far from the kingâs doors, âand,â quoth he, âthis is the print of Karkaras.â Thereafter they followed that stream all day, and at many places its banks were new-trampled and torn and the water of the pools that lay about it was fouled as though some beasts possessed of madness had rolled and fought there not long before.

Now sinks the sun and fades beyond the western trees and darkness is creeping down from HisilÃ³mÃ« so that the light of the forest dies. Even so come they to a place where the spoor swerves from the stream or perchance is lost in its waters and Huan may no longer follow it; and here therefore they encamp, sleeping in turns beside the stream, and the early night wears away.

Suddenly in Berenâs watch a sound of great terror leaped up from far awayâa howling as of seventy maddened wolvesâthen lo! the brushwood cracks and saplings snap as the terror draweth near, and Beren knows that Karkaras is upon them. Scarce had he time to rouse the others, and they were but just sprung up and half-awake, when a great form loomed in the wavering moonlight filtering there, and it was fleeing like one mad, and its course was bent towards the water. Thereat Huan gave tongue, and straightway the beast swerved aside towards them, and foam was dripping from his jaws and a red light shining from his eyes, and his face was marred with mingled terror and with wrath. No sooner did he leave the trees than Huan rushed upon him fearless of heart, but he with a mighty leap sprang right over that great dog, for all his fury was kindled suddenly against Beren whom he recognized as he stood behind, and to his dark mind it seemed that there was the cause of all his agony. Then Beren thrust swiftly upward with a spear into his throat, and Huan leapt again and had him by a hind leg, and Karkaras fell as a stone, for at that same moment the king's spear found his heart, and his evil spirit gushed forth and sped howling faintly as it fared over the dark hills to Mandos; but Beren lay under him crushed beneath his weight. Now they roll back that carcase and fall to cutting it open, but Huan licks Beren's face whence blood is flowing. Soon is the truth of Beren's words made clear, for the vitals of the wolf are half-consumed as though an inner fire had long been smouldering there, and suddenly the night is filled with a wondrous lustre, shot with pale and secret colours, as Mablung¹³ draws forth the Silmaril. Then holding it out he said: "Behold O King,"¹⁴ but Tinwelint said: "Nay, never will I handle it save only if Beren give it to me." But Huan said: "And that seems like never to be, unless ye tend him swiftly, for methinks he is hurt sorely" and Mablung and the king were ashamed.

Therefore now they raised Beren gently up and tended him and washed him, and he breathed, but he spoke not nor opened his eyes, and when the sun arose and they had rested a little they bore him as softly as might be upon a bier of boughs back through the woodlands; and nigh midday they drew near the homes of the folk again, and then were they deadly weary, and Beren had not moved nor spoken, but groaned thrice.

There did all the people flock to meet them when their approach was noised among them, and some bore them meat and cool drinks and salves and healing things for their hurts, and but for the harm that Beren had met great indeed had been their joy. Now then they covered the leafy boughs whereon he lay with soft raiment, and they bore him away to the halls of the king, and there was Tinwiel awaiting them in great distress; and she fell upon Beren's breast and wept and kissed him, and he awoke and knew her, and after Mablung gave him that Silmaril, and he lifted it above him gazing at its beauty, ere he said slowly and with pain: "Behold, O King, I give thee the wondrous jewel thou didst desire, and it is but a little thing found by the wayside, for once methinks thou hadst one beyond thought more beautiful, and she is now mine." Yet even as he spake the shadows of Mandos lay upon his face, and his spirit fled in that hour to the margin of the world, and Tin^ovielâs tender kisses called him not back.

Â

Then did V^{ann} suddenly cease speaking, and Eriol sadly said: "A tale of ruth for so sweet a maid to tell" but behold, V^{ann} wept, and not for a while did she say: "Nay, that is not all the tale; but here endeth all that I rightly know," and other children there spake, and one said: "Lo, I have heard that the magic of Tin^ovielâs tender kisses healed Beren, and recalled his spirit from the gates of Mandos, and long time he dwelt among the Lost Elves wandering the glades in love with sweet Tin^oviel." But another said: "Nay, that was not so, O Ausir, and if thou wilt listen I will tell the true and wondrous tale; for Beren died there in Tin^ovielâs arms even as V^{ann} has said, and Tin^oviel crushed with sorrow and finding no comfort or light in all the world followed him swiftly down those dark ways that all must tread alone. Now her beauty and tender loveliness touched even the cold heart of Mandos, so that he suffered her to lead Beren forth once more into the world, nor has this ever been done since to Man or Elf, and many songs and stories are there of the prayer of Tin^oviel before the throne of Mandos that I remember not right well. Yet said Mandos to those twain: "Lo, O Elves, it is not to any life of perfect joy that I dismiss you, for such may no longer be found in all the world where sits Melko of the evil heart" and know ye that ye will become mortal even as Men, and when ye fare hither again it will be for ever, unless the Gods summon you indeed to Valinor." Nonetheless those twain departed hand in hand, and they fared together through the northern woods, and oftentimes were they seen dancing magic dances down the hills, and their name became heard far and wide.

And thereat that boy ceased, and V^{ann} said: "Aye, and they did more than dance, for their deeds afterward were very great, and many tales are there thereof that thou must hear, O Eriol Melinon, upon another time of tale-telling. For those twain it is that stories name iÂ-Cuilwarthon, which is to say the dead that live again, and they became mighty fairies in the lands about the north of Sirion. Behold now all is endedâand doth it like thee?â But Eriol said: âIndeed âtis a wondrous tale, such as I looked not to hear from the lips of the little maids of Mar Vanwa TyaliÂ©va,â but VÂ«annÂ» answered him: âNay, but I fashioned it not with words of myself; but it is dear to meâand indeed all the children know of the deeds that it relatesâand I have learned it by heart, reading it in the great books, and I do not comprehend all that is set therein.â

âNeither do I,â said Eriolâbut suddenly cried Ausir: âBehold, Eriol, VÂ«annÂ» has never told thee what befell Huan; nor how he would take no rewards from Tinwelint nor dwell nigh him, but wandered forth again grieving for TinÂ°viel and Beren. On a time he fell in with Mablung¹⁵ who aided in the chase, and was now fallen much to hunting in lonely parts; and the twain hunted together as friends until the days of Glorund the Drake and of TÂ°rin Turambar, when once more Huan found Beren and played his part in the great deeds of the Nauglafring, the Necklace of the Dwarves.â âNay, how could I tell all this,â said VÂ«annÂ», âfor behold it is time for the evening meat alreadyâ and soon after the great gong rang.

The second version of the Tale of TinÂ°viel

As already mentioned (p. 3), there exists a revised version of part of the tale in a typescript (made by my father). This follows the manuscript version closely or very closely on the whole, and in no way alters the style or air of the former; it is therefore unnecessary to give this second version in extenso. But the typescript does in places introduce interesting changes, and these are given below (the pages of the corresponding passages in the manuscript version are given in the margin).

The title in the typescript (which begins with the Link passage already given, pp. 4â7) was originally âThe Tale of Tynwfiel, Princess of Dor Athroâ, which was changed to âThe Tale of TinÃºviel, the Dancer of Doriath.

Â

(8)Â Â Â Â Â Who then was TinÃºviel?Â said Eriol. ÂKnowst thou not,Â said Ausir, Âshe was the daughter of Singoldo, king of Artanor?Â ÂHush thee, Ausir,Â said VÃ«annÃ«, Âthis is my tale, and âtis a tale of the Gnomes, wherefore I beg that thou fill not Eriolâs ear with thy Elfin names. Lo! I will tell this tale only, for did I not see Melian and TinÃºviel once long ago with my own eyes when journeying by the Way of Dreams?Â

ÂWhat then was Queen Melian like,Â quoth Eriol, Âif thou hast seen her, O VÃ«annÃ«?Â

ÂSlender and very dark of hair,Â said she, Âand her skin was white and pale, but her eyes shone seeming to hold great depths. Clad she was in filmy garments most lovely yet of the hue of night, jet-spangled and girt with silver. If ever she sang or if ever she danced, dreams and slumbers passed over the heads of those that were nigh, making them heavy as it were with a strong wine of sleep. Indeed she was a sprite that, escaping from LÃ³rienâs gardens before even KÃ³r was built, wandered in the wild places of the world and in every lonely wood. Nightingales fared with her singing about her as she wentÂand Âtwas the song of these birds that smote the ears of Thingol as he marched at the head of that second¹⁶ tribe of the EldaliÃ« which afterward became the Shoreland Pipers, the Solosimpi of the Isle. Now had they come a great way from dim Palisor, and wearily the companies laboured behind the swift-footed horse of OromÃ«, wherefore the music of the magic birds of Melian seemed to him full of all solace, more beautiful than other melodies of Earth, and he strayed aside for a moment, as he thought, from the host, seeking in the dark trees whence it might come.

And it is said that it was not a moment that he hearkened, but many years, and vainly his people sought him, until at length they must perforce follow OromÃ« upon Tol EressÃ«, and be borne thereon far away leaving him listening to the birds enchanted in the woods of Aryador. That was the first sorrow of the Solosimpi, that after were many; but IlÃºvatar in memory of Thingol set a seed of music in the hearts of that folk above all kindreds of the Earth save only the Gods, and after, as all story tells, it blossomed wondrously upon the isle and in glorious Valinor.

Little sorrow, however, had Thingol; for after a little, as him seemed, he came upon Melian lying on a bed of leavesâ (9)Â Â Â Â Â Long thereafter, as now thou knowest, Melko brake once more into the world from Valinor, and wellnigh all beings therein came under his foul thralldom; nor were the Lost Elves free, nor the errant Gnomes that wandered the mountainous places seeking their stolen treasury. Yet some few there were that led by mighty kings still defied that evil one in fast and hidden places, and if Turgon King of Gondolin was the most glorious of these, for a while the most mighty and the longest free was Thingol of the Woods.

Now in the after-days of Sunshine and Moonsheen still dwelt Thingol in Artanor and ruled a numerous and hardy folk drawn from all the tribes of ancient Elfinesseâfor neither he nor his people went to the dread Battle of Unnumbered Tearsâa matter which toucheth not this tale. Yet was his lordship greatly increased after that most bitter field by fugitives seeking a leader and a home. Hidden was his dwelling thereafter from the vision and knowledge of Melko by the cunning magics of Melian the fay, and she wove spells about all the paths that led thereto, so that none but the children of the EldaliÃ« might tread them without straying. Thus was the king guarded against all evils save treachery alone; his halls were builded in a deep cavern, vaulted immeasurable, that knew no other entrance than a rocky door, mighty, pillared with stone, and shadowed by the loftiest and most ancient trees in all the shaggy forests of Artanor. A great stream was there that fared a dark and silent course in the deep woods, and this flowed wide and swift before that doorway, so that all who would enter that portal must first cross a bridge hung by the Noldoli of Thingolâs service across that waterâand narrow it was and strongly guarded. In no wise ill were those forest lands, although not utterly distant were the Iron Mountains and black Hisil³m³ beyond them where dwelt the strange race of Men, and thrall-Noldoli laboured, and few free-Eldar went.

Two children had Thingol then, Dairon and Tin³viel³!

- (10) [^][^][^][^][^] her mother was a fay, a child of L³rien³ for manuscript her mother was a fay, a daughter of the Gods.

[^]

- (11) [^][^][^][^][^] Now Beren was a Gnome, son of Egnor the forester as in manuscript; but Egnor changed to Barahir. This however was a much later and as it were casual change; Beren's father was still Egnor in 1925.

[^]

- (11) [^][^][^][^][^] Manuscript version and all the Elves of the woodland thought of the Gnomes of Dor L³min as treacherous creatures, cruel and faithless is omitted in the typescript.

[^]

- (13) [^][^][^][^][^] Angband for manuscript Angamandi, and throughout.

[^]

- (14) [^][^][^][^][^] Many a combat and an escape had he in those days, and he slew therein more than once both wolf and the Orc that rode thereon with nought but an ashen club that he bore; and other perils and adventures!

[^]

- (15) [^][^][^][^][^] But Melko looking wroth upon him asked: 'How hast thou, O thrall, dared to fare thus out of the land where thy folk dwells at my behest, and to wander in the great woods unbidden, leaving the labours to which thou hast been set?' Then answered Beren that he was no runagate thrall, but came of a kindred of the Gnomes that dwelt in Aryador where were many of the folk of Men. Then was Melko yet more wroth, saying: 'Here have we a plotter of deep treacheries against Melko's lordship, and one worthy of the tortures of the Balrogs' for he sought ever to destroy the friendship and intercourse of Elves and Men, lest they forget the Battle of Unnumbered Tears and once more arise in wrath against him. But Beren seeing his peril answered: "Think not, O most mighty Belcha Morgoth (for such be his names among the Gnomes), that could be so; for, an it were, then should I not be here unaided and alone. No friendship has Beren son of Egnor for the kindred of Men; nay indeed, wearying utterly of the lands infested by that folk he has wandered out of Aryador. Whither then should he go but to Angband? For many a great tale has his father made to him aforetime of thy splendour and thy glory. Lo, lord, albeit I am no renegade thrall, still do I desire nothing so much as to serve thee in what small manner I may." Little of truth was therein, and indeed his father Egnor was the chiefest foe of Melko in all the kin of the Gnomes that still were free, save only Turgon king of Gondolin and the sons of Fëanor, and long days of friendship had he known with the folk of Men, what time he was brother in arms to Arin the steadfast; but in those days he bore another name and Egnor was nought for Melko. The truth, however, did Beren then tell, saying that he was a great huntsman, swift and cunning to shoot or snare or to outrun all birds and beasts. "I was lost unawares in a part of the hills that were not known to me, O lord," he said, "the while I was hunting; and wandering far I came to strange lands and knew no other rede of safety save to fare to Angband, that all can find who see the black hills of the north from afar. I would myself have fared to thee and begged of thee some humble office (as a winner of meats for thy table, perchance) had not these Orcs seized me and tormented me unjustly."

Now the Valar must have inspired that speech, or maybe it was a spell of cunning words cast upon him in compassion by Melian as he fled from the hall; for indeed it saved his life.

Subsequently a part of this passage was emended on the typescript, to read:

"and long days of friendship had he known with the folk of Men (as had Beren himself thereafter as brother in arms to Arin the Steadfast); but in those days the Orcs named him Rog the Fleet, and the name of Egnor was nought to Melko.

At the same time the words "Now the Valar must have inspired that speech" were changed to "Now the Valar inspired that speech".

- (15) "Thus was Beren set by Melko as a thrall to The Prince of Cats, whom the Gnomes have called Tiberth Bridhon Miaugion, but the Elves Tevildo.

Subsequently Tiberth appears for MS Tevildo throughout, and in one place the full name Tiberth Bridhon Miaugion appears again. In the MS the Gnomish name is Tifil.

- (17) "getting nought but a bitten finger for his toil. Then was Tiberth wroth, and said: "Thou hast lied to my lord, O Gnome, and art fitter to be a scullion than a huntsman, who canst not catch even the mice about my halls." Evil thereafter were his days in the power of Tiberth; for a scullion they made him, and unending labour he had in the hewing of wood and drawing of water, and in the menial services of that noisome abode. Often too was he tormented by the cats and other evil beasts of their company, and when, as happened at whiles, there was an Orc-feast in those halls, he would oftentimes be set to the roasting of birds and other meats upon spits before the mighty fires in Melko's dungeons, until he swooned for the overwhelming heat; yet he knew himself fortunate beyond all hope in being yet alive among those cruel foes of Gods and Elves. Seldom got he food or sleep himself, and he became haggard and half-blind, so that he wished often that never straying out of the wild free places of Hisil-mâ he had not even caught sight afar off of the vision of Tinviel.

^

- (17) "But Melian laughed not, nor said aught thereto; for in many things was she wise and forewise yet nonetheless it was a thing unthought in a mad dream that any Elf, still less a maiden, the daughter of that king who had longest defied Melko, should fare alone even to the borders of that sorrowful country amid which lies Angband and the Hells of Iron. Little love was there between the woodland Elves and the folk of Angband even in those days before the Battle of

Unnumbered Tears when Melkoâs power was not grown to its full, and he veiled his designs, and spread his net of lies. âNo help wilt thou get therein of me, little one,â said she; âfor even if magic and destiny should bring thee safe out of that foolhardiness, yet should many and great things come thereof, and on some many sorrows, and my rede is that thou tell never thy father of thy desire.â

But this last word of Melianâs did Thingol coming unaware overhear, and they must perforce tell him all, and he was so wroth when he heard it that TinÃ°viel wished that never had her thoughts been revealed even to her mother.

- (18) Indeed I have no love for him, for he has destroyed our play together, our music and our dancing.â But TinÃ°viel said: âI ask it not for him, but for myself, and for that very play of ours together aforetime.â And Dairon said: âAnd for thy sake I say thee nayâ and they spake no more thereof together, but Dairon told the king of what TinÃ°viel had desired of him, fearing lest that dauntless maiden fare away to her death in the madness of her heart.

Â

- (18)â|he might not shut his daughter for ever in the caves, where the light was only that of torches dim and flickering.

Â

- (19)The names of all the tallest and longest things upon Earth were set in that song: the beards of the Indrafangs, the tail of Carcaras, the body of Glorund the drake, the bole of Hirilorn, and the sword of Nan she named, nor did she forget the chain Angainu that AulÃ° and Tulkas made, or the neck of Gilim the giant that is taller than many elm trees;â|

Carcaras is spelt thus subsequently in the typescript.

- (20)â|as fast as her dancing feet would flit.

Now when the guards awoke it was late in the morning, and they fled away nor dared to bear the tidings to their lord; and Dairon it was bore word of the escape of TinÃ°viel to Thingol, for he had met the folk that ran in amazement from the ladders which each morning were lifted to her door. Great was the mingled grief and wrath of the king, and all the deep places of his court were in uproar, and all the woods were ringing with the search; but TinÃ©viel was already far away dancing madly through the dark woods towards the gloomy foothills and the Mountains of Night. âTis said that Dairon sped swiftest and furthest in pursuit, but was wrapped in the deceit of those far places, and became utterly lost, and came never back to Elfinesse, but turned towards Palisor; and there he plays subtle magic musics still, wistful and lonely in the woods and forests of the south.

Now fared TinÃ©viel forward, and a sudden dread overtook her at the thought of what she had dared to do, and of what lay before her. Then did she turn back for a while, and wept, wishing that Dairon were with her. It is said that he was not indeed at that time far off, and wandered lost in Taurfuin, the Forest of Night, where after TÃ©rin slew Beleg by mishap. Nigh was TinÃ©viel to those evil places; but she entered not that dark region, and the Valar set a new hope in her heart, so that she pressed on once more.

(21)Â Â Â Â Â Seldom was any of the cats slain indeed; for in those days they were mightier far in valour and in strength than they have been since those things befell that thou art soon to learn, mightier even than the tawny cats of the southern lands where the sun burns hot. No less too was their skill in climbing and in hiding, and their fleetness was that of an arrow, yet were the free dogs of the northern woods marvellously valiant and knew no fear, and great enmity was between them, and some of those hounds were held in dread even by the greatest of the cats. None, however, did Tiberth fear save only Huan the lord of the Hounds of HisilÃ³mÂ«. So swift was Huan that on a time he had fallen upon Tiberth as he hunted alone in the woods, and pursuing him had overtaken him and nigh rent the fur of his neck from him ere he was rescued by a host of Orcs that heard his cries. Huan got him many hurts in that battle ere he won away, but the wounded pride of Tiberth lusted ever for his death.

Great therefore was the good fortune that befell TinÃ©viel in meeting with Huan in the woods; and this she did in a little glade nigh to the forest's borders, where the first grasslands begin that are nourished by the upper waters of the river Sirion. Seeing him she was mortally afraid and turned to flee; but in two swift leaps Huan overtook her. Speaking softly the deep tongue of the Lost Elves he bade her be not afraid, and wherefore, said he, do I see an Elfin maiden, and one most fair, wandering thus nigh to the places of the Prince of Evil Heart?

(22) What is thy thought, O Huan?

Little counsel have I for thee, said he, save that thou goest with all speed back to Artanor and thy father's halls, and I will accompany thee all the way, until those lands be reached that the magic of Melian the Queen does encompass. That will I never do, said she, while Beren liveth here, forgotten of his friends. I thought that such would be thy answer, said he, but if thou wilt still go forward with thy mad quest, then no counsel have I for thee save a desperate and a perilous one: we must make now all speed towards the ill places of Tiberth's abiding that are yet far off. I will guide thee thither by the most secret ways, and when we are come there thou must creep alone, if thou hast the heart, to the dwelling of that prince at an hour nigh noon when he and most of his household lie drowsing upon the terraces before his gates. There thou mayst perchance discover, if fortune is very kind, whether Beren be indeed within that ill place as thy mother said to thee. But lo, I will lie not far from the foot of the mount whereon Tiberth's hall is built, and thou must say to Tiberth so soon as thou seest him, be Beren there or be he not, that thou hast stumbled upon Huan of the Dogs lying sick of great wounds in a withered dale without his gates. Fear not overmuch, for herein wilt thou both do my pleasure and further thine own desires, as well as may be; nor do I think that when Tiberth hears thy tidings thou wilt be in any peril thyself for a time. Only do thou not direct him to the place that I shall show to thee; thou must offer to guide him thither thyself. Thus thou shalt get free again of his evil house, and shalt see what I contrive for the Prince of Cats.â Then did TinÃ^oviel shudder at the thought of what lay before, but she said that this rede would she sooner take than to return home, and they set forth straightway by secret pathways through the woods, and by winding trails over the bleak and stony lands that lay beyond.

At last on a day at morn they came to a wide dale hollowed like a bowl among the rocks. Deep were its sides, but nought grew there save low bushes of scanty leaves and withered grass. âThis is the Withered Dale that I spake of,â said Huan. âYonder is the cave where the great

Here the typescript version of the Tale of TinÃ^oviel ends, at the foot of a page. I think it is improbable that any more of this version was made.

NOTES

- 1 For earlier references to OlÃ³rÃ« MallÃ«, the Way of Dreams, see I.18, 27; 211, 225.
- 2 The distinction made here between the Elves (who call the queen Wendelin) and, by implication, the Gnomes (who call her Gwendeling) is even more explicit in the typescript version, p. 42 (ââtis a tale of the Gnomes, wherefore I beg that thou fill not Eriolâs ears with thy Elfin namesâ) and p. 45 (âThe Prince of Cats, whom the Gnomes have called Tiberth Bridhon Miaugion, but the Elves Tevildoâ). See I.50â1.
- 3 The manuscript as originally written read: âNow Beren was a Gnome, son of a thrall of Melkoâs, some have said, that laboured in the darker placesâ|â See note 4.
- 4 The manuscript as originally written read: âI Beren of the Noldoli, son of Egnor the huntsmanâ|â See note 3.
- 5 From this point, and continuing to the words âforests of the southâ on p. 21, the text is written on detached pages placed in the notebook. There is no rejected material corresponding to this passage. It is possible that it existed, and was removed from the book and lost; but, though the book is in a decayed state, it does not seem that any pages were removed here, and I think it more likely that my father simply found himself short of space, as he wrote over the original, erased, version, and (almost certainly) expanded it as he went.

- 6 The text as originally written read: âcame never back to Ellu, but playsâ|â (for Ellu see Changes to Names below). As a result of the interpolation âbut turned towards Palisorâ Palisor is placed in the south of the world. In the tale of The Coming of the Elves (I. 114) Palisor is called âthe midmost regionâ (see also the drawing of the âWorld-Shipâ, I.84), and it seems possible that the word âsouthâ should have been changed; but it remains in the typescript (p. 47).
- 7 The Tale of Turambar, though composed after the Tale of TinÃ°viel, was in existence when TinÃ°viel was rewritten (see p. 69).
- 8 From âamazed utterlyâ to âif TinÃ°viel were not thereâ (p. 30) the text is written on an inserted page; see note 5âhere also the underlying textual situation is obscure.
- 9 A short passage of earlier text in pencil becomes visible here, ending: ââ|and TinÃ°viel grew to long sorely for Wendelin her mother and for the sight of LinwÃ« and for Kapalen making music in pleasant glades.â Kapalen must be a name preceding Tifanto, itself preceding Dairon (see Changes to Names below).
- 10 this Gnome: original reading this man. This was a slip, but a significant slip (see p. 52), in all probability. It is possible that âmanâ was used here, as occasionally elsewhere (e.g. p. 18 âas high as men could fashion their longest laddersâ, where the reference is to the Elves of Artanor), to mean âmale Elfâ, but in that case there would seem no reason to change it.

- 11 Struck out here in the manuscript: âBeren of the Hillsâ.
- 12 âMablung the heavy-handed, chief of the kingâs thanes, leaped up and grasped a spearâ replaced the original reading âTifanto cast aside his pipe and grasped a spearâ. Originally the name of TinÃºvielâs brother was Tifanto throughout the tale. See notes 13â15, and the Commentary, p. 59.
- 13 Mablung replaced Tifanto, and again immediately below; see note 12.
- 14 âO Kingâ replaced âO fatherâ see note 12.
- 15 In this place Mablung was the form as first written; see the Commentary, p. 59.
- 16 It is essential to the narrative of the Coming of the Elves that the Solosimpi were the third and last of the three tribes; âsecondâ here can only be a slip, if a surprising one.

Changes made to names in The Tale of TinÃºviel

(i) Manuscript Version

Ilfiniol < Elfriniol. In the typescript text the name is Ilfrin. See pp. 201â2.

TinwÃ« Linto, Tinwelint In the opening passage of the tale (p. 8), where Ausir and VÃ«annÃ« differ on the forms of Tinwelintâs name, the MS is very confused and it is impossible to understand the succeeding stages. Throughout the tale, as originally written, VÃ«annÃ« calls Tinwelint Tinto Ellu or Ellu, but in the argument at the beginning it is Ausir who calls him Tinto Ellu while VÃ«annÃ« calls him Tintoellon. (Tinto) Ellu is certainly an âElvishâ form, but it is corrected throughout the tale to the Gnomish Tinwelint, while Ausirâs Tinto Ellu at the beginning is corrected to TinwÃ« Linto. (At the third occurrence of TinwÃ« in the opening passage the name as originally written was LinwÃ«: see I. 130.)

In the tales of The Coming of the Elves and The Theft of Melko

in Part One Ellu is the name of the second lord of the Solosimpi chosen in Tinwelintâs place (afterwards Olwë), but at both occurrences (I. 120, 141) this is a later addition (I. 130 note 5, 155). Many years later Ellu again became Thingolâs name (Sindarin Elu Thingol, Quenya Elwë Singollo, in The Silmarillion).

Gwendeling As the tale was originally written, Wendelin was the name throughout (Wendelin is found in tales given in Part One, emended from Tindriel: I. 106â7, 131). It was later changed throughout to the Gnomish form Gwendeling (found in the early Gnomish dictionary, I. 273, itself changed later to Gwedhiling) except in the mouth of Ausir, who uses the âElvishâ form Wendelin (p. 8).

Dairon < Tifanto throughout. For the change of Tifanto > Mablung at the end of the tale (notes 12â14 above) see the Commentary, p. 59, and for the name Kapalen preceding Tifanto see note 9.

Dor Lâ³min < Aryador (p. 11). In the tale of The Coming of the Elves it is said (I. 119) that Aryador was the name of Hisilâ³mâ among Men; for Dor Lâ³minâHisilâ³mâ see I. 112. At subsequent occurrences in this tale Aryador was not changed.

Angband was originally twice written, and in one of these cases it was changed to Angamandi, in the other (p. 35) allowed to stand; in all other instances Angamandi was the form first written. In the manuscript version of the tale Vâ«annâ does not make consistent use of Gnomish or âElvishâ forms: thus she says Tevildo (not Tifil), Angamandi, Gwendeling (< Wendelin), Tinwelint (< Tinto (Ellu)). In the typescript version, on the other hand, Vâ«annâ says Tiberth, Angband, Melian (< Gwenethlin), Thingol (< Tinwelint).

Hirilorn, the Queen of Trees < Golosbrindi, the Queen of the Forest (p. 18); Hirilorn < Golosbrindi at subsequent occurrences.

Uinen < Onen (or possibly Ānen).

Egnor bo-Rimion < Egnor go-Rimion. In the tales previously given the patronymic prefix is go-(I. 146, 155).

Tinwelint < Tinthellon (p. 35, the only case). Cf. Tintoâellon mentioned above under Tinwâ Linto.

iâ-Cuilwarthon < iâ-Guilwarthon.

(ii) Typescript Version

TinÃviel < Tynwfiel in the title and at every occurrence until the passage corresponding to MS version p. 11 âyet now did he see TinÃviel dancing in the twilightâ there and subsequently the form typed was TinÃviel.

Singoldo < TinwÃ Linto (p. 41).

Melian < Gwenethlin at every occurrence until the passage corresponding to MS version p. 12 âthe stateliness of Queen Gwendelingâ there and subsequently the form typed was Melian.

Thingol < Tinwelint at every occurrence until the passage corresponding to MS version p. 12 âby winding paths to the abode of Tinwelintâ there and subsequently the form typed was Thingol.

For Egnor > Barahir see p. 43.

Commentary on The Tale of TinÃviel

Â§ 1. The primary narrative

In this section I shall consider only the conduct of the main story, and leave for the moment such questions as the wider history implied in it, Tinwelintâs people and his dwelling, or the geography of the lands that appear in the story.

The story of Berenâs coming upon TinÃviel in the moonlit glade in its earliest recorded form (pp. 11â12) was never changed in its central image; and it should be noticed that the passage in The Silmarillion (p. 165) is an extremely concentrated and exalted rendering of the scene: many elements not mentioned there were never in fact lost. In a very late reworking of the passage in the *Lay of Leithian the hemlocks and the white moths still appear, and Daeron the minstrel is present when Beren comes to the glade. But there are nonetheless the most remarkable differences; and the chief of these is of course that Beren was here no mortal Man, but an Elf, one of the Noldoli, and the absolutely essential element of the story of Beren and LÃthien is not present. It will be seen later (pp. 71â2, 139) that this was not originally so, however: in the now lost (because erased) first form of the Tale of Tinwiel he had been a Man (it is for this reason that I have said that the reading man in the manuscript (see p. 33 and note 10), later changed to Gnome, is a significant slip). Several years after the composition of the tale in the form in which we have it he became a Man again, though at that time (1925-6) my father appears to have hesitated long on the matter of the elvish or mortal nature of Beren.

In the tale there is, necessarily, a quite different reason for the hostility and distrust shown to Beren in Artanor (Doriath) namely that the Elves of the woodland thought of the Gnomes of Dor as treacherous creatures, cruel and faithless (see below, p. 65). It seems clear that at this time the history of Beren and his father (Egnor) was only very sketchily devised; there is in any case no hint of the story of the outlaw band led by his father and its betrayal by Gorlim the Unhappy (The Silmarillion pp. 162ff.) before the first form of the Lay of Leithian, where the story appears fully formed (the Lay was in being to rather beyond this point by the late summer of 1925). But an association of Beren's father (changed to Beren himself) with Arin (Hárin) as brother in arms is mentioned in the typescript version of the tale (pp. 44-5); according to the latest of the outlines for Gilfanon's Tale (I. 240) Arin and Egnor marched with countless battalions (against the forces of Melko).

In the old story, Tinwiel had no meetings with Beren before the day when he boldly accosted her at last, and it was at that very time that she led him to Tinwelint's cave; they were not lovers, Tinwiel knew nothing of Beren but that he was enamoured of her dancing, and it seems that she brought him before her father as a matter of courtesy, the natural thing to do. The betrayal of Beren to Thingol by Daeron (The Silmarillion p. 166) therefore has no place in the old story there is nothing to betray; and indeed it is not shown in the tale that Daeron knew anything whatsoever of Beren before Tinwiel led him into the cave, beyond having once seen his face in the moonlight.

Despite these radical differences in the narrative structure, it is remarkable how many features of the scene in Tinwelint's hall (pp. 12-13), when Beren stood before the king, endured, while all the inner significance was shifted and enlarged. To the beginning go back, for instance, Beren's abashment and silence, Tinwiel's answering for him, the sudden rising of his courage and uttering of his desire without preamble or hesitation. But the tone is altogether lighter and less grave than it afterwards became; in the jeering laughter of Tinwelint, who treats the matter as a jest and Beren as a benighted fool, there is no hint of what is explicit in the later story: "Thus he wrought the doom of Doriath, and was ensnared within the curse of Mandos" (The Silmarillion p. 167). The Silmarils are indeed famous, and they have a holy power (p. 34), but the fate of the world is not bound up with them (The Silmarillion p. 67); Beren is an Elf, if of a feared and distrusted people, and his request lacks the deepest dimension of outrage; and he and Tinwiel are not lovers.

In this passage is the first mention of the Iron Crown of Melko, and the setting of the Silmarils in the Crown; and here again is a detail that was never lost: "Never did this crown leave his head" (cf. The Silmarillion p. 81: "That crown he never took from his head, though its weight became a deadly weariness").

But from this point Tolkien's story diverges in an altogether unexpected fashion from the later narrative. At no other place in the Lost Tales is the subsequent transformation more remarkable than in this, the precursor of the story of the capture of Beren and Felagund and their companions by Sauron the Necromancer, the imprisonment and death of all save Beren in the dungeons of Tol-in-Gaurhoth (the Isle of Werewolves in the river Sirion), and the rescue of Beren and overthrow of Sauron by Lúthien and Huan.

Most notably, what may be referred to as "the Nargothrond Element" is entirely absent, and in so far as it already existed had as yet made no contact with the story of Beren and Tinwiel (for Nargothrond, not yet so named, at this period see pp. 81, 123-4). Beren has no ring of Felagund, he has no companions on his northward journey, and there is no relationship between (on the one hand) the story of his capture, his speech with Melko, and his dispatch to the house of Tevildo, and (on the other) the events of the later narrative whereby Beren and the band of Elves out of Nargothrond found themselves in Sauron's dungeon. Indeed, all the complex background of legend, of battles and rivalries, oaths and alliances, out of which the story of Beren and Lúthien arises in The Silmarillion, is very largely absent. The castle of the Cats is the tower of Sauron on Tol-in-Gaurhoth, but only in the sense that it occupies the same "space" in the narrative: beyond this there is no point in seeking even shadowy resemblances between the two establishments. The monstrous gormandising cats, their kitchens and their sunning terraces, and their engagingly Elvish-feline names (Miaugion, MiaulÃ«, Meoita) all disappeared without trace. Did Tevildo? It would scarcely be true, I think, to say even that Sauron âoriginatedâ in a cat: in the next phase of the legends the Necromancer (ThÃ«) has no feline attributes. On the other hand it would be wrong to regard it as a simple matter of replacement (ThÃ« stepping into the narrative place vacated by Tevildo) without any element of transformation of what was previously there. Tevildoâs immediate successor is âthe Lord of Wolvesâ, himself a werewolf, and he retains the Tevildo-trait of hating Huan more than any other creature in the world. Tevildo was âan evil fay in beastlike shapeâ (p. 29); and the battle between the two great beasts, the hound against the werewolf (originally the hound against the demon in feline form) was never lost.

When the tale returns to TinÃ«viel in Artanor the situation is quite the reverse: for the story of her imprisonment in the house in Hirilorn and her escape from it never underwent any significant change. The passage in The Silmarillion (p. 172) is indeed very brief, but its lack of detail is due to compression rather than to omission based on dissatisfaction; the Lay of Leithian, from which the prose account in The Silmarillion directly derives, is in this passage so close, in point of narrative detail, to the Tale of TinÃ«viel as to be almost identical with it.

It may be observed that in this part of the story the earliest version had a strength that was diminished later, in that the duration of TinÃ«vielâs imprisonment and her journey to Berenâs rescue relates readily enough to that of Berenâs captivity, which was intended by his captors to be unending; whereas in the later story there is a great deal of event and movement (with the addition of LÃ«thienâs captivity in Nargothrond) to be fitted into the time when Beren was awaiting his death in the dungeon of the Necromancer.

While the strong element of âexplanatoryâ beast-fable (concerning cats and dogs) was to be entirely eliminated, and Tevildo Prince of Cats replaced by the Necromancer, Huan nonetheless remained from it as the great Hound of Valinor. His encounter with TinÃ«viel in the woods, her inability to escape from him, and indeed his love for her from the moment of their meeting (suggested in the tale, p. 23, explicit in The Silmarillion p. 173), were already present, though the context of their encounter and the motives of Huan were wholly different from the absence of the Nargothrond Elementâ (Felagund, Celegorm and Curufin).

In the story of the defeat of Tevildo and the rescue of Beren the germ of the later legend is clearly seen, though for the most part only in broad structural resemblances. It is curious to observe that the loud speaking of Tinâviel sitting perched on the sill of the kitchen hatch in the castle of the Cats, so that Beren might hear, is the precursor of her singing on the bridge of Tol-in-Gaurhoth the song that Beren heard in his dungeon (The Silmarillion p. 174). Tevildo's intention to hand her over to Melko remained in Sauron's similar purpose (ibid.); the killing of the cat Oikeroi (p. 28) is the germ of Huan's fight with Draugluin; the skin of Huan's dead opponent is put to the same use in either case (pp. 30â1, The Silmarillion pp. 178â9); the battle of Tevildo and Huan was to become that of Huan and Wolf-Sauron, and with essentially the same outcome: Huan released his enemy when he yielded the mastery of his dwelling. This last is very notable: the utterance by Tinâviel of the spell which bound stone to stone in the evil castle (p. 29). Of course, when this was written the castle of Tevildo was an adventitious feature in the story; it had no previous history: it was an evil place through and through, and the spell (deriving from Melko) that Tevildo was forced to reveal was the secret of Tevildo's own power over his creatures as well as the magic that held the stones together. With the entry of Felagund into the developing legend and the Elvish watchtower on Tol Sirion (Minas Tirith: The Silmarillion pp. 120, 155â6) captured by the Necromancer, the spell is displaced: for it cannot be thought to be the work of Felagund, who built the fortress, since if it had been he would have been able to pronounce it in the dungeon and bring the place down over their headsâa less evil way for them to die. This element in the legend remained, however, and is fully present in The Silmarillion (p. 175), though since my father did not actually say there that Sauron told Huan and Lâthien what the words were, but only that he yielded himselfâ, one may miss the significance of what happened:

And she said: "There everlastingly thy naked self shall endure the torment of his scorn, pierced by his eyes, unless thou yield to me the mastery of thy tower."

Then Sauron yielded himself, and Lúthien took the mastery of the isle and all that was there.

Then Lúthien stood upon the bridge, and declared her power: and the spell was loosed that bound stone to stone, and the gates were thrown down, and the walls opened, and the pits laid bare.

Here again the actual matter of the narrative is totally different in the early and late forms of the legend: in The Silmarillion many thralls and captives came forth in wonder and dismay for they had lain long in the darkness of Sauron, whereas in the tale the inmates who emerged from the shaken dwelling (other than Beren and the apparently inconsequent figure of the blind slave-Gnome Gimli) were a host of cats, reduced by the breaking of Tevildo's spell to puny size. (If my father had used in the tale names other than Huan, Beren, and Tinúviel, and in the absence of all other knowledge, including that of authorship, it would not be easy to demonstrate from a simple comparison between this part of the Tale and the story as told in The Silmarillion that the resemblances were more than superficial and accidental.)

A more minor narrative point may be noticed here. The typescript version would presumably have treated the fight of Huan and Tevildo somewhat differently, for in the manuscript Tevildo and his companion can flee up great trees (p. 28), whereas in the typescript nothing grew in the Withered Dale (where Huan was to lie feigning sick) save a few bushes of scanty leaves (p. 48).

Â

In the remainder of the story the congruence between early and late forms is far closer. The narrative structure in the tale may be summarised thus:

â Beren is attired for disguise in the fell of the dead cat Oikeroi.

â He and Tinúviel journey together to Angamandi.

â Tinúviel lays a spell of sleep on Karkaras the wolf-ward of Angamandi.

- â They enter Angamandi, Beren slinks in his beast-shape beneath the seat of Melko, and TinÃ°viel dances before Melko.
- â All the host of Angamandi and finally Melko himself are cast into sleep, and Melkoâs iron crown rolls from his head.
- â TinÃ°viel rouses Beren, who cuts a Silmaril from the crown, and the blade snaps.
- â The sleepers stir, and Beren and TinÃ°viel flee back to the gates, but find Karkaras awake again.
- â Karkaras bites off Berenâs outthrust hand holding the Silmaril.
- â Karkaras becomes mad with the pain of the Silmaril in his belly, for the Silmaril is a holy thing and sears evil flesh.
- â Karkaras goes raging south to Artanor.
- â Beren and TinÃ°viel return to Artanor; they go before Tinwelint and Beren declares that a Silmaril is in his hand.
- â The hunting of the wolf takes place, and Mablung the Heavy-handed is one of the hunters.
- â Beren is slain by Karkaras, and is borne back to the cavern of Tinwelint on a bier of boughs; dying he gives the Silmaril to Tinwelint.
- â TinÃ°viel follows Beren to Mandos, and Mandos permits them to return into the world.

Changing the catskin of Oikeroi to the wolfskin of Draugluin, and altering some other names, this would do tolerably well as a prÃ©cis of the story in The Silmarillion! But of course it is devised as a summary of similarities. There are major differences as well as a host of minor ones that do not appear in it.

Again, most important is the absence of âthe Nargothrond Elementâ. When this combined with the Beren legend it introduced Felagund as Berenâs companion, LÃ°thienâs imprisonment in Nargothrond by Celegorm and Curufin, her escape with Huan the hound of Celegorm, and the attack on Beren and LÃ°thien as they returned from Tol-in-Gaurhoth by Celegorm and Curufin, now fleeing from Nargothrond (The Silmarillion pp. 173â4, 176â8).

The narrative after the conclusion of the episode of the Thralldom of Beren is conducted quite differently in the old story (pp. 30â1), in that here Huan is with Beren and TinÃviel; TinÃviel longs for her home, and Beren is grieved because he loves the life in the woods with the dogs, but he resolves the impasse by determining to obtain a Silmaril, and though Huan thinks their plan is folly he gives them the fell of Oikeroi, clad in which Beren sets out with TinÃviel for Angamandi. In The Silmarillion (p. 177) likewise, Beren, after long wandering in the woods with LÃthien (though not with Huan), resolves to set forth again on the quest of the Silmaril, but LÃthien's stance in the matter is different:

âYou must choose, Beren, between these two: to relinquish the quest and your oath and seek a life of wandering upon the face of the earth; or to hold to your word and challenge the power of darkness upon its throne. But on either road I shall go with you, and our doom shall be alike.â

There then intervened the attack on Beren and LÃthien by Celegorm and Curufin, when Huan, deserting his master, joined himself to them; they returned together to Doriath, and when they got there Beren left LÃthien sleeping and went back northwards by himself, riding Curufin's horse. He was overtaken on the edge of Anfauglith by Huan bearing LÃthien on his back and bringing from Tol-in-Gaurhoth the skins of Draugluin and of Sauron's bat-messenger Thuringwethil (of whom in the old story there is no trace); attired in these Beren and LÃthien went to Angband. Huan is here their active counsellor.

The later legend is thus more full of movement and incident in this part than is the Tale of TinÃviel (though the final form was not achieved all at one stroke, as may be imagined); and in the Silmarillion form this is the more marked from the fact that the account is a compression and a summary of the long Lay of Leithian.*

In the Tale of TinÃviel the account of Beren's disguise is characteristically detailed: his instruction by TinÃviel in feline behaviour, his heat and discomfort inside the skin. TinÃ°vielâs disguise as a bat has however not yet emerged, and whereas in The Silmarillion when confronted by Carcharoth she âcast back her foul raimentâ and âcommanded him to sleepâ, here she used once more the magical misty robe spun of her hair: âthe black strands of her dark veil she cast in his eyesâ (p. 31). The indifference of Karkaras to the false Oikeroi contrasts with Carcharothâs suspicion of the false Druagluin, of whose death he had heard tidings: in the old story it is emphasised that no news of the discomfiture of Tevildo (and the death of Oikeroi) had yet reached Angamandi.

The encounter of TinÃ°viel with Melko is given with far more detail than in The Silmarillion (here much compressed from its source); notable is the phrase (p. 32) âhe leered horribly, for his dark mind pondered some evilâ, forerunner of that in The Silmarillion (p. 180):

Then Morgoth looking upon her beauty conceived in his thought an evil lust, and a design more dark than any that had yet come into his heart since he fled from Valinor.

We are never told anything more explicit.

Whether Melkoâs words to TinÃ°viel, âWho art thou that flittest about my halls like a bat?â, and the description of her dancing ânoiseless as a batâ, were the germ of her later bat-disguise cannot be said, though it seems possible.

The knife with which Beren cut the Silmaril from the Iron Crown has a quite different provenance in the Tale of TinÃ°viel, being a kitchen-knife that Beren took from Tevildoâs castle (pp. 29, 33); in The Silmarillion it was Angrist, the famous knife made by Telchar which Beren took from Curufin. The sleepers of Angamandi are here disturbed by the sound of the snapping of the knife-blade; in The Silmarillion it is the shard flying from the snapped knife and striking Morgothâs cheek that makes him groan and stir.

There is a minor difference in the accounts of the meeting with the wolf as Beren and TinÃ°viel fled out. In The Silmarillion âLâ°thien was spent, and she had not time nor strength to quell the wolfâ in the tale it seems that she might have done so if Beren had not been precipitate. Much more important, there appears here for the first time the conception of the holy power of the Silmarils that burns unhallowed flesh.*

The escape of TinÃ¶viel and Beren from Angamandi and their return to Artanor (pp. 34â6) is treated quite differently in the Tale of TinÃ¶viel. In The Silmarillion (pp. 182â3) they were rescued by the Eagles and set down on the borders of Doriath; and far more is made of the healing of Berenâs wound, in which Huan plays a part. In the old story Huan comes to them later, after their long southward flight on foot. In both accounts there is a discussion between them as to whether or not they should return to her fatherâs hall, but it is quite differently conductedâin the tale it is she who persuades Beren to return, in The Silmarillion it is Beren who persuades her.

There is a curious feature in the story of the Wolf-hunt (pp. 38â9) which may be considered here (see p. 50, notes 12â15). At first, it was TinÃ¶vielâs brother who took part in the hunt with Tinwelint, Beren, and Huan, and his name is here Tifanto, which was the name throughout the tale before its replacement by Dairon.* Subsequently âTifantoââwithout passing through the stage of âDaironââwas replaced by âMablung the heavy-handed, chief of the kingâs thanesâ, who here makes his first appearance, as the fourth member of the hunt. But earlier in the tale it is told that Tifanto > Dairon, leaving Artanor to seek TinÃ¶viel, became utterly lost, âand came never back to Elfinesseâ (p. 21), and the loss of Tifanto > Dairon is referred to again when Beren and TinÃ¶viel returned to Artanor (pp. 36â7).

Thus on the one hand Tifanto was lost, and it is a grief to TinÃ¶viel on her return to learn of it, but on the other he was present at the Wolf-hunt. Tifanto was then changed to Dairon throughout the tale, except in the story of the Wolf-hunt, where Tifanto was replaced by a new character, Mablung. This shows that Tifanto was removed from the hunt before the change of name to Dairon, but does not explain how, under the name Tifanto, he was both lost in the wilds and present at the hunt. Since there is nothing in the MS itself to explain this puzzle, I can only conclude that my father did, in fact, write at first that Tifanto was lost and never came back, and also that he took part in the Wolf-hunt; but observing this contradiction he introduced Mablung in the latter tale (and probably did this even before the tale was completed, since at the last appearance of Mablung his name was written thus, not emended from Tifanto: see note 15). It was subsequent to this that Tifanto was emended, wherever it still stood, to Dairon.

In the tale the hunt is differently managed from the story in The Silmarillion (where, incidentally, Beleg Strongbow was present). It is curious that all (including, as it appears, Huan!) save Beren were asleep when Karkaras came on them (âin Berenâs watchâ, p. 39). In The Silmarillion Huan slew Carcharoth and was slain by him, whereas here Karkaras met his death from the kingâs spear, and the boy Ausir tells at the end that Huan lived on to find Beren again at the time of âthe great deeds of the Nauglafringâ (p. 41). Of Huanâs destiny, that he should not die âuntil he encountered the mightiest wolf that would ever walk the worldâ, and of his being permitted âthrice only ere his death to speak with wordsâ (The Silmarillion p. 173), there is nothing here.

The most remarkable feature of the Tale of TinÃ²viel remains the fact that in its earliest extant form Beren was an Elf; and in this connection very notable are the words of the boy at the end (p. 40):

Yet said Mandos to those twain: âLo, O Elves, it is not to any life of perfect joy that I dismiss you, for such may no longer be found in all the world where sits Melko of the evil heartâand know ye that ye will become mortal even as Men, and when ye fare hither again it will be for ever, unless the Gods summon you indeed to Valinor.â

In the tale of The Coming of the Valar and the Building of Valinor there occurs the following passage (I. 76; commentary I. 90):

Thither [i.e. to Mandos] in after days fared the Elves of all the clans who were by illhap slain with weapons or did die of grief for those that were slainâand only so might the Eldar die, and then it was only for a while. There Mandos spake their doom, and there they waited in the darkness, dreaming of their past deeds, until such time as he appointed when they might again be born into their children, and go forth to laugh and sing again.

The same idea occurs in the tale of The Music of the Ainur (I. 59). The peculiar dispensation of Mandos in the case of Beren and TinÃ©viel as here conceived is therefore that their whole ânaturalâ destiny as Elves was changed: having died as Elves might die (from wounds or from grief) they were not reborn as new beings, but returned from Mandos in their own personsâyet now âmortal even as Menâ. The earliest eschatology is too unclear to allow of a satisfactory interpretation of this âmortalityâ, and the passage in The Building of Valinor on the fates of Men (I. 77) is particularly hard to understand (see the commentary on it, I. 90ff.). But it seems possible that the words âeven as Menâ in the address of Mandos to Beren and TinÃ©viel were included to stress the finality of whatever second deaths they might undergo; their departure would be as final as that of Men, there would be no second return in their own persons, and no reincarnation. They will remain in Mandos (âwhen ye fare hither again it will be for everâ)âunless they are summoned by the Gods to dwell in Valinor. These last words should probably be related to the passage in The Building of Valinor concerning the fate of certain Men (I. 77):

Few are they and happy indeed for whom at a season doth NornorÃ« the herald of the Gods set out. Then ride they with him in chariots or upon good horses down into the vale of Valinor and feast in the halls of Valmar, dwelling in the houses of the Gods until the Great End come.

Â§ 2. Places and peoples in the Tale of TinÃ©viel

To consider first what can be learned of the geography of the Great Lands from this tale: the early âdictionaryâ of the Gnomish language makes it clear that the meaning of Artanor was âthe Land Beyondâ, as it is interpreted in the text (p. 9). Several passages in the Lost Tales cast light on this expression. In an outline for Gilfanonâs untold tale (I. 240) the Noldoli exiled from Valinor

now fought for the first time with the Ores and captured the pass of the Bitter Hills; thus they escaped from the Land of Shadowsâ|They entered the Forest of Artanor and the Region of the Great Plainsâ|

(which latter, I suggested, may be the forerunner of the later Talath Dirnen, the Guarded Plain of Nargothrond). The tale to follow Gilfanonâs, according to the projected scheme (I. 241), was to be that of TinÃ¶viel, and this outline begins: âBeren son of Egnor wandered out of Dor LÃ³min [i.e. HisilÃ³mÃ¶, see I. 112] into Artanorâ!â In the present tale, it is said that Beren came âthrough the terrors of the Iron Mountains until he reached the Lands Beyondâ (p. 11), and also (p. 21) that some of the Dogs âroamed the woods of HisilÃ³mÃ¶ or passing the mountainous places fared even at times into the region of Artanor and the lands beyond and to the southâ. And finally, in the Tale of Turambar (p. 72) there is a reference to âthe road over the dark hills of Hithlum into the great forests of the Land Beyond where in those days Tinwelint the hidden king had his abodeâ.

It is quite clear, then, that Artanor, afterwards called Doriath (which appears in the title to the typescript text of the Tale of TinÃ¶viel, together with an earlier form Dor Athro, p. 41), lay in the original conception in much the same relation to HisilÃ³mÃ¶ (the Land of Shadow(s), Dor LÃ³min, Aryador) as does Doriath to Hithlum (HisilÃ³mÃ¶) in The Silmarillion: to the south, and divided from it by a mountain-range, the Iron Mountains or Bitter Hills.

In commenting on the tale of The Theft of Melko and the Darkening of Valinor I have noticed (I. 158â9) that whereas in the Lost Tales HisilÃ³mÃ¶ is declared to be beyond the Iron Mountains, it is also said (in the Tale of Turambar, p. 77) that these mountains were so named from Angband, the Hells of Iron, which lay beneath âtheir northernmost fastnessesâ, and that therefore there seems to be a contradictory usage of the term âIron Mountainsâ within the *Lost Tales*âunless it can be supposed that these mountains were conceived as a continuous range, the southerly extension (the later Mountains of Shadow) forming the southern fence of HisilÃ³mÃ¶, while the northern peaks, being above Angband, gave the range its nameâ.

Now in the Tale of TinÃ¶viel Beren, journeying north from Artanor, âdrew nigh to the lower hills and treeless lands that warned of the approach of the bleak Iron Mountainsâ (p. 14). These he had previously traversed, coming out of HisilÃ³mÃ¶ but now âhe followed the Iron Mountains till he drew nigh to the terrible regions of Melkoâs abodeâ. This seems to support the suggestion that the mountains fencing HisilÃ³mÃ« from the Lands Beyond were continuous with those above Angband; and we may compare the little primitive map (I. 81), where the mountain range f isolates HisilÃ³mÃ« (g): see I. 112, 135. The implication is that âdimâ or âblackâ HisilÃ³mÃ« had no defence against Melko.

There appear now also the Mountains of Night (pp. 20, 46â7), and it seems clear that the great pinewoods of Taurfuin, the Forest of Night, grew upon those heights (in The Silmarillion Dorthonion âLand of Pinesâ, afterwards named Taur-nu-Fuin). Dairon was lost there, but TinÃºviel, though she passed near, did not enter âthat dark regionâ. There is nothing to show that it was not placed then as it was laterâto the east of Ered Wethrin, the Mountains of Shadow. It is also at least possible that the description (in the manuscript version only, p. 23) of TinÃºviel, on departing from Huan, leaving âthe shelter of the treesâ and coming to âa region of long grassâ is a first intimation of the great plain of Ard-galen (called after its desolation Anfauglith and Dor-nu-Fauglith), especially if this is related to the passage in the typescript version telling of TinÃºvielâs meeting with Huan âin a little glade nigh to the forestâs borders, where the first grasslands begin that are nourished by the upper waters of the river Sirionâ (p. 47).

After their escape from Angamandi Huan found Beren and TinÃºviel âin that northward region of Artanor that was called afterward Nan Dumgorthin, the land of the dark idolsâ (p. 35). In the Gnomish dictionary Nan Dumgorthin is defined as âa land of dark forest east of Artanor where on a wooded mountain were hidden idols sacrificed to by some evil tribes of renegade menâ (dum âsecret, not to be spokenâ, dumgort, dungort âan (evil) idolâ). In the Lay of the Children of HÃºrin in alliterative verse TÃºrin and his companion Flinding (later Gwindor), fleeing after the death of Beleg Strongbow, came to this land:

There the twain enfolded phantom twilight and dim mazes dark, unholy, in Nan Dungorthin where nameless gods have shrouded shrines in shadows secret, more old than Morgoth or the ancient lords the golden Gods of the guarded West.

But the ghostly dwellers of that grey valley hindered nor hurt them, and they held their course with creeping flesh and quaking limb.
Yet laughter at whiles with lingering echo, as distant mockery of demon voices there harsh and hollow in the hushed twilight
Flinding fancied, fell, unwholesomeâ|

There are, I believe, no other references to the gods of Nan Dumgorthin. In the poem the land was placed west of Sirion; and finally, as Nan Dungortheb âthe Valley of Dreadful Deathâ, it becomes in The Silmarillion (pp. 81, 121) a âno-landâ between the Girdle of Melian and Ered Gorgoroth, the Mountains of Terror. But the description of it in the Tale of TinÃviel as a ânorthward region of Artanorâ clearly does not imply that it lay within the protective magic of Gwendeling, and it seems that this âzoneâ was originally less distinctly bounded, and less extensive, than âthe Girdle of Melianâ afterwards became. Probably Artanor was conceived at this time as a great region of forest in the heart of which was Tinwelintâs cavern, and only his immediate domain was protected by the power of the queen:

Hidden was his dwelling from the vision and knowledge of Melko by the magics of Gwendeling the fay, and she wove spells about the paths thereto that none but the Eldar might tread them easily, and so was the king secured from all dangers save it be treachery alone. (p. 9).

It seems, also, that her protection was originally by no means so complete and so mighty a wall of defence as it became. Thus, although Orcs and wolves disappeared when Beren and TinÃviel âstepped within the circle of Gwendelingâs magic that hid the paths from evil things and kept harm from the regions of the woodelvesâ (p. 35), the fear is expressed that even if Beren and TinÃviel reached the cavern of King Tinwelint âthey would but draw the chase behind them thitherâ (p. 34), and Tinwelintâs people feared that Melko would âupraise his strength and come utterly to crush them and Gwendelingâs magic have not the strength to withhold the numbers of the Orcsâ (p. 36).

The picture of Menegroth beside Esgalduin, accessible only by the bridge (The Silmarillion pp. 92â3) goes back to the beginning, though neither cave nor river are named in the tale. But (as will be seen more emphatically in later tales in this book) Tinwelint, the wood-fairy in his cavern, had a long elevation before him, to become ultimately Thingol of the Thousand Caves (âthe fairest dwelling of any king that has ever been east of the Seaâ). In the beginning, Tinwelintâs dwelling was not a subterranean city full of marvels, silver fountains falling into basins of marble and pillars carved like trees, but a rugged cave; and if in the typescript version the cave comes to be âvaulted immeasurableâ, it is still illuminated only by the dim and flickering light of torches (pp. 43, 46).

Â

There have been earlier references in the Lost Tales to Tinwelint and the place of his dwelling. In a passage added to, but then rejected from, the tale of The Chaining of Melko (I. 106, note 1) it is said that he was lost in HisilÃ³mÃ« and met Wendelin there; âloving her he was content to leave his folk and dance for ever in the shadowsâ. In The Coming of the Elves (I. 115) âTinwÃ« abode not long with his people, and yet âtis said lives still lord of the scattered Elves of HisilÃ³mÃ«â and in the same tale (I. 118â19) the âLost Elvesâ were still there âlong after when Men were shut in HisilÃ³mÃ« by Melkoâ, and Men called them the Shadow Folk, and feared them. But in the Tale of TinÃ³viel the conception has changed. Tinwelint is now a king râuling, not in HisilÃ³mÃ«, but in Artanor.* (It is not said where it was that he came upon Gwendeling.)

In the account (manuscript version only, see pp. 9, 42) of Tinwelintâs people there is mention of Elves âwho remained in the darkâ and this obviously refers to Elves who never left the Waters of Awakening. (Of course those who were lost on the march from Palisor also never left âthe darkâ (i.e. they never came to the light of the Trees), but the distinction made in this sentence is not between the darkness and the light but between those who remained and those who set out). On the emergence of this idea in the course of the writing of the Lost Tales see I. 234. Of Tinwelintâs subjects âthe most were Ilkorindiâ, and they must be those who âhad been lost upon the march from Palisorâ (earlier, âthe Lost Elves of HisilÃ³mÃ«â).

Here, a major difference in essential conception between the old legend and the form in The Silmarillion is apparent. These Ilkorindi of Tinwelintâs following (âeerie and strange beingsâ whose âdark songs and chantingsâ faded in the wooded places or echoed in deep cavesâ) are described in terms applicable to the wild Avari (âthe Unwillingâ) of The Silmarillion; but they are of course actually the precursors of the Grey-elves of Doriath. The term Eldar is here equivalent to Elves (âall the Eldar both those who remained in the dark or had been lost upon the march from Palisorâ) and is not restricted to those who made, or at least embarked on, the Great Journey; all were IlkorindiâDark Elvesâif they never passed over the Sea. The later significance of the Great Journey in conferring âEldarinâ status was an aspect of the elevation of the Grey-elves of Beleriand, bringing about a distinction of the utmost importance within the category of the Moriquendi or âElves of the Darknessââthe Avari (who were not Eldar) and the Ãmanyar (the Eldar who were ânot of Amanâ): see the table âThe Sundering of the Elvesâ given in The Silmarillion. Thus:

Â

Lost Tales

Â

Eldar: of KÃ´r

Eldar: of the Great Lands (the Darkness): Ilkorindi

Â

Silmarillion

Avari

Â

Eldar (of the Great Journey): of Aman

Eldar (of the Great Journey): of Middle-earth (Ãmanyar)

Â

But among Tinwelintâs subjects there were also Noldoli, Gnomes. This matter is somewhat obscure, but at least it may be observed that the manuscript and typescript versions of the Tale of TinÃviel do not envisage precisely the same situation.

The manuscript text is perhaps not perfectly explicit on the subject, but it is said (p. 9) that of Tinwelintâs subjects âthe most were Ilkorindiâ, and that before the rising of the Sun âalready were their numbers mingled with a many wandering Gnomesâ.

Yet Dairon fled from the apparition of Beren in the forest because all the Elves of the woodland thought of the Gnomes of Dor L³min as treacherous creatures, cruel and faithlessâ (p. 11); and âDread and suspicion was between the Eldar and those of their kindred that had tasted the slavery of Melko, and in this did the evil deeds of the Gnomes at the Haven of the Swans revenge itselfâ (p. 11). The hostility of the Elves of Artanor to Gnomes was, then, specifically a hostility to the Gnomes of Hisil³m³â« (Dor L³min), who were suspected of being under the will of Melko (and this is probably a foreshadowing of the suspicion and rejection of Elves escaped from Angband described in The Silmarillion p. 156). In the manuscript it is said (p. 9) that all the Elves of the Great Lands (those who remained in Palisor, those who were lost on the march, and the Noldoli returned from Valinor) fell beneath the power of Melko, though many escaped and wandered in the wild; and as the manuscript text was first written (see p. 11 and note 3) Beren was âson of a thrall of Melkoâ that laboured in the darker places in the north of Hisil³m³â. This conception seems reasonably clear, so far as it goes.

In the typescript version it is expressly stated that there were Gnomes âin Tinwelintâs serviceâ (p. 43): the bridge over the forest river, leading to Tinwelintâs door, was hung by them. It is not now stated that all the Elves of the Great Lands fell beneath Melko; rather there are named several centres of resistance to his power, in addition to Tinwelint/Thingol in Artanor: Turgon of Gondolin, the Sons of F³âanor, and Egnor of Hisil³m³â« (Berenâs father)âone of the chiefest foes of Melko âin all the kin of the Gnomes that still were freeâ (p. 44). Presumably this led to the exclusion in the typescript of the passage telling that the woodland Elves thought of the Gnomes of Dor L³min as treacherous and faithless (see p. 43), while that concerning the distrust of those who had been Melkoâs slaves was retained. The passage concerning Hisil³m³â âwhere dwelt Men, and thrall-Noldoli laboured, and few free-Eldar wentâ (p.10) was also retained; but Hisil³m³â, in Berenâs wish that he had never strayed out of it, becomes âthe wild free places of Hisil³m³â« (pp. 17, 45).

This leads to an altogether baffling question, that of the references to the Battle of Unnumbered Tears; and several of the passages just cited bear on it.

The story of the Travail of the Noldoli and the Coming of Mankind that was to have been told by Gilfanon, but which after its opening pages most unhappily never got beyond the stage of outline projections, was to be followed by that of Beren and Tinwiel (see I. 241). After the Battle of Unnumbered Tears there is mention of the Thralldom of the Noldoli, the Mines of Melko, the Spell of Bottomless Dread, the shutting of Men in Hisilm, and then Beren son of Egnor wandered out of Dor Min into Artanorâ (In The Silmarillion the deeds of Beren and Lâthien preceded the Battle of Unnumbered Tears.)

Now in the Tale of Tinwiel there is a reference, in both versions, to the thrall-Noldoli who laboured in Hisilm and of Men dwelling there; and as the passage introducing Beren was first written in the manuscript his father was one of these slaves. It is said, again in both versions, that neither Tinwelint nor the most part of his people went to the battle, but that his lordship was greatly increased by fugitives from it (p. 9); and to the following statement that his dwelling was hidden by the magic of Gwendeling/Melian the typescript adds the word thereafter (p. 43), i.e. after the Battle of Unnumbered Tears. In the changed passage in the typescript referring to Egnor he is one of the chiefest foes of Melko in all the kin of the Gnomes that still were free.

All this seems to allow of only one conclusion: the events of the Tale of Tinwiel took place after the great battle; and this seems to be clinched by the express statement in the typescript: where the manuscript (p. 15) says that Melko sought ever to destroy the friendship and intercourse of Elves and Men, the second version adds (p. 44): lest they forget the Battle of Unnumbered Tears and once more arise in wrath against him.

It is very odd, therefore, that Vann should say at the beginning (in the manuscript only, p. 10 and see p. 43) that she will tell of things that happened in the halls of Tinwelint after the arising of the Sun indeed but long ere the unforgotten Battle of Unnumbered Tears. (This in any case seems to imply a much longer period between the two events than is suggested in the outlines for Gilfanon's Tale: see I. 242). This is repeated later (p. 17): it was a thing unthought that any Elf should fare untended to the halls of Melko, even in those earlier days before the Battle of Tears when Melko's power had not grown great. But it is stranger still that this second sentence is retained in the typescript (p. 45). The typescript version has thus two inescapably contradictory statements:

Melko sought ever to destroy the friendship and intercourse of Elves and Men, lest they forget the Battle of Unnumbered Tears (p. 44);

Little love was there between the woodland Elves and the folk of Angband even in those days before the Battle of Unnumbered Tears (p. 45).

Such a radical contradiction within a single text is in the highest degree unusual, perhaps unique, in all the writings concerned with the First Age. But I can see no way to explain it, other than simply accepting it as a radical contradiction; nor indeed can I explain those statements in both versions that the events of the tale took place before the battle, since virtually all indications point to the contrary.*

Â§ 3. Miscellaneous Matters

(i) Morgoth

Beren addresses Melko as 'most mighty Belcha Morgoth', which are said to be his names among the Gnomes (p. 44). In the Gnomish dictionary Belcha is given as the Gnomish form corresponding to Melko (see I. 260), but Morgoth is not found in it: indeed this is the first and only appearance of the name in the Lost Tales. The element goth is given in the Gnomish dictionary with the meaning 'war, strife' but if Morgoth meant at this period 'Black Strife' it is perhaps strange that Beren should use it in a flattering speech. A name-list made in the 1930s explains Morgoth as 'formed from his Orc-name Goth 'Lord or Master' with mor 'dark or black' prefixed', but it seems very doubtful that this etymology is valid for the earlier period. This name-list explains Gothmog 'Captain of Balrogs' as containing the same Orc-element ('Voice of Goth (Morgoth)'); but in the name-list to the tale of The Fall of Gondolin (p. 216) the name Gothmog is said to mean 'Strife-and-hatred' (mog-detest, hate appears in the Gnomish dictionary), which supports the interpretation of Morgoth in the present tale as âBlack Strifeâ.*

(ii) Orcs and Balrogs

Despite the reference to âthe wandering bands of the goblins and the Orcsâ (p. 14, retained in the typescript version), the terms are certainly synonymous in the Tale of Turambar. The Orcs are described in the present tale (ibid.) as âfoul broodlings of Melkoâ. In the second version (p. 44) wolf-rider Orcs appear.

Balrogs, mentioned in the tale (p. 15), have appeared in one of the outlines for Gilfanonâs Tale (I. 241); but they had already played an important part in the earliest of the Lost Tales, that of The Fall of Gondolin (see pp. 212â13).

(iii) Tinâvielâs âlengthening spellâ

Of the âlongest thingsâ named in this spell (pp. 19â20, 46) two, âthe sword of Nanâ and âthe neck of Gilim the giantâ, seem now lost beyond recall, though they survived into the spell in the Lay of Leithian, where the sword of Nan is itself named, Glend, and Gilim is called âthe giant of Erumanâ. Gilim in the Gnomish dictionary means âwinterâ (see I. 260, entry Melko), which does not seem particularly appropriate: though a jotting, very difficult to read, in the little notebook used for memoranda in connection with the Lost Tales (see I. 171) seems to say that Nan was a âgiant of summer of the Southâ, and that he was like an elm.

The Indravangs (Indrafangs in the typescript) are the âLongbeardsâ this is said in the Gnomish dictionary to be âa special name of the Nauglath or Dwarvesâ (see further the Tale of the Nauglafring, p. 247).

Karkaras (Carcaras in the typescript) âKnife-fangâ is named in the spell since he was originally conceived as the âfather of wolves, who guarded the gates of Angamandi in those days *and long had done so*â (p. 21). In The Silmarillion (p. 180) he has a different history: chosen by Morgoth âfrom among the whelps of the race of Draugluinâ and reared to be the death of Huan, he was set before the gates of Angband in that very time. In The Silmarillion (ibid.) Carcharoth is rendered âthe Red Mawâ, and this expression is used in the text of the tale (p. 34): âboth hand and jewel Karkaras bit off and took into his red mawâ.

Glorund is the name of the dragon in the Tale of Turambar (Glaurung in The Silmarillion).

In the tale of The Chaining of Melko there is no suggestion that Tulkas had any part in the making of the chain (there in the form Angaino): I. 100.

(iv) The influence of the Valar

There is frequent suggestion that the Valar in some way exercised a direct influence over the minds and hearts of the distant Elves in the Great Lands. Thus it is said (p. 15) that the Valar must have inspired Beren's ingenious speech to Melko, and while this may be no more than a rhetorical flourish, it is clear that Tinúviel's dream of Beren is meant to be accepted as a dream of the Valar (p. 19). Again, the Valar set a new hope in her heart (p. 47); and later in Vëann's tale the Valar are seen as active fates, guiding the destinies of the characters so the Valar brought Huan to find Beren and Tinúviel in Nan Dumgorthin (p. 35), and Tinúviel says to Tinwelint that the Valar alone saved Beren from a bitter death (p. 37).

II

TURAMBAR AND THE FOALĀKĀ

The Tale of Turambar, like that of TinĀviel, is a manuscript written in ink over a wholly erased original in pencil. But it seems certain that the extant form of Turambar preceded the extant form of TinĀviel. This can be deduced in more ways than one, but the order of composition is clearly exemplified in the forms of the name of the King of the Woodland Elves (Thingol). Throughout the manuscript of Turambar he was originally Tintoglin (and this appears also in the tale of The Coming of the Elves, where it was changed to Tinwelint, I. 115, 131). A note on the manuscript at the beginning of the tale says: "Tintoglin's name must be altered throughout to Ellon or Tinthellon = Q. Ellu", but the note was struck out, and all through the tale Tintoglin was in fact changed to Tinwelint.

Now in the Tale of TinĀviel the king's name was first given as Ellu (or Tinto Ellu), and once as Tinthellon (pp. 50-1); subsequently it was changed throughout to Tinwelint. It is clear that the direction to change Tintoglin to "Ellon or Tinthellon = Q. Ellu" belongs to the time when the Tale of TinĀviel was being, or had been, rewritten, and that the extant Tale of Turambar already existed.

There is also the fact that the rewritten TinĀviel was followed, at the same time of composition, by the first form of the interlude in which Gilfanon appears (see I. 203), whereas at the beginning of Turambar there is a reference to Ailios (who was replaced by Gilfanon) concluding the previous tale. On the different arrangement of the tale-telling at this point that my father subsequently introduced but failed to carry through see I. 229-30. According to the earlier arrangement, Ailios told his tale on the first night of the feast of TuruhalmĀ or the Logdrawing, and Eltas followed with the Tale of Turambar on the second.

There is evidence that the Tale of Turambar was in existence at any rate by the middle of 1919. Humphrey Carpenter discovered a passage, written on a scrap of proof for the Oxford English Dictionary, in an early alphabet of my father's devising; and transliterating it he found it to be from this tale, not far from the beginning. He has told me that my father was using this version of the 'Alphabet of Rāmilā about June 1919 (see Biography, p. 100).

Â

When then Ailios had spoken his fill the time for the lighting of candles was at hand, and so came the first day of Turuhalmâ to an end; but on the second night Ailios was not there, and being asked by Lindo one Eltas began a tale, and said:

âNow all folk gathered here know that this is the story of Turambar and the Foalâ³kâ, and it is,â said he, âa favourite tale among Men, and tells of very ancient days of that folk before the Battle of Tasarinan when first Men entered the dark vales of Hisilâ³mâ.

In these days many such stories do Men tell still, and more have they told in the past especially in those kingdoms of the North that once I knew. Maybe the deeds of other of their warriors have become mingled therein, and many matters beside that are not in the most ancient taleâbut now I will tell to you the true and lamentable tale, and I knew it long ere I trod Olâ³râ Mallâ in the days before the fall of Gondolin.

In those days my folk dwelt in a vale of Hisilâ³mâ and that land did Men name Aryador in the tongues they then used, but they were very far from the shores of Asgon and the spurs of the Iron Mountains were nigh to their dwellings and great woods of very gloomy trees. My father said to me that many of our older men venturing afar had themselves seen the evil worms of Melko and some had fallen before them, and by reason of the hatred of our people for those creatures and of the evil Vala often was the story of Turambar and the Foalâ³kâ in their mouthsâbut rather after the fashion of the Gnomes did they say Turumart and the Fuithlug.

For know that before the Battle of Lamentation and the ruin of the Noldoli there dwelt a lord of Men named Ārin, and hearkening to the summons of the Gnomes he and his folk marched with the Ilkorindi against Melko, but their wives and children they left behind them in the woodlands, and with them was Mavwin wife of Ārin, and her son remained with her, for he was not yet war-high. Now the name of that boy was TĀ^orin and is so in all tongues, but Mavwin do the Eldar call MavoinĀ.

Now Ārin and his followers fled not from that battle as did most of the kindreds of Men, but many of them were slain fighting to the last, and Ārin was made captive. Of the Noldoli who fought there all the companies were slain or captured or fled away in rout, save that of Turondo (Turgon) only, and he and his folk cut a path for themselves out of that fray and come not into this tale. Nonetheless the escape of that great company marred the complete victory that otherwise had Melko won over his adversaries, and he desired very greatly to discover whither they had fled; and this he might not do, for his spies availed nothing, and no tortures at that time had power to force treacherous knowledge from the captive Noldoli.

Knowing therefore that the Elves of KĀ[~]r thought little of Men, holding them in scant fear or suspicion for their blindness and lack of skill, he would constrain Ārin to take up his employ and go seek after Turondo as a spy of Melko. To this however neither threats of torture nor promises of rich reward would bring Ārin to consent, for he said: âNay, do as thou wilt, for to no evil work of thine wilt thou ever constrain me, O Melko, thou foe of Gods and Men.â

âOf a surety,â said Melko in anger, âto no work of mine will I bid thee again, nor yet will I force thee thereto, but upon deeds of mine that will be little to thy liking shalt thou sit here and gaze, nor be able to move foot or hand against them.â And this was the torture he devised for the affliction of Ārin the Steadfast, and setting him in a lofty place of the mountains he stood beside him and cursed him and his folk with dread curses of the Valar, putting a doom of woe and a death of sorrow upon them; but to Ārin he gave a measure of vision, so that much of those things that befell his wife and children he might see and be helpless to aid, for magic held him in that high place. âBehold!â said Melko, âthe life of Turin thy son shall be accounted a matter for tears wherever Elves or Men are gathered for the telling of talesâ but Urin said: âAt least none shall pity him for this, that he had a craven for father.â

Now after that battle Mavwin got her in tears into the land of Hithlum or Dor LÃ³min where all Men must now dwell by the word of Melko, save some wild few that yet roamed without. There was NienÃ³ri born to her, but her husband Ærin languished in the thralldom of Melko, and TÃ³rin being yet a small boy Mavwin knew not in her distress how to foster both him and his sister, for Ærinâs men had all perished in the great affray, and the strange men who dwelt nigh knew not the dignity of the Lady Mavwin, and all that land was dark and little kindly.

Â

The next short section of the text was struck through afterwards and replaced by a rider on an attached slip. The rejected passage reads:

Â

At that time the rumour [written above: memory] of the deeds of Beren Ermabwed had become noised much in Dor LÃ³min, wherefore it came into the heart of Mavwin, for lack of better counsel, to send TÃ³rin to the court of Tintoglin,¹ begging him to foster this orphan for the memory of Beren, and to teach him the wisdom of fays and of Eldar; now Egnor² was akin to Mavwin and he was the father of Beren the One-handed.

The replacement passage reads:

Amended passage to fit better with the story of TinÃ³viel and the afterhistory of the Nauglafring:

The tale tells however that Ærin had been a friend of the Elves, and in this he was different from many of his folk. Now great had his friendship been with Egnor, the Elf of the greenwood, the huntsman of the Gnomes, and Beren Ermabwed son of Egnor he knew and had rendered him a service once in respect of Damrod his son; but the deeds of Beren of the One Hand in the halls of Tinwelint³ were remembered still in Dor LÃ³min. Wherefore it came into the heart of Mavwin, for lack of other counsel, to send TÃ³rin her son to the court of Tinwelint, begging him to foster this orphan for the memory of Ærin and of Beren son of Egnor.⁴

Â

Very bitter indeed was that sundering, and for long [?time] TÃ³rin wept and would not leave his mother, and this was the first of the many sorrows that befell him in life. Yet at length when his mother had reasoned with him he gave way and prepared him in anguish for that journey. With him went two old men, retainers aforetime of his father Ærin, and when all was ready and the farewells taken they turned their feet towards the dark hills, and the little dwelling of Mavwin was lost in the trees, and TÃ°rin blind with tears could see her no more. Then ere they passed out of earshot he cried out: âO Mavwin my mother, soon will I come back to theeâbut he knew not that the doom of Melko lay between them.

Long and very weary and uncertain was the road over the dark hills of Hithlum into the great forests of the Land Beyond where in those days Tinwelint the hidden king had his abode; and TÃ°rin son of Ærin⁵ was the first of Men to tread that way, nor have many trodden it since. In perils were TÃ°rin and his guardians of wolves and wandering Orcs that at that time fared even thus far from Angband as the power of Melko waxed and spread over the kingdoms of the North. Evil magics were about them, that often missing their way they wandered fruitlessly for many days, yet in the end did they win through and thanked the Valar thereforâyet maybe it was but part of the fate that Melko wove about their feet, for in after time TÃ°rin would fain have perished as a child there in the dark woods.

Howso that may be, this was the manner of their coming to Tinwelintâs halls; for in the woodlands beyond the mountains they became utterly lost, until at length having no means of sustenance they were like to die, when they were discovered by a wood-ranger, a huntsman of the secret Elves, and he was called Beleg, for he was of great stature and girth as such was among that folk. Then Beleg led them by devious paths through many dark and lonely forestlands to the banks of that shadowed stream before the cavernous doors of Tinwelintâs halls. Now coming before that king they were received well for the memory of Ærin the Steadfast, and when also the king heard of the bond tween Ærin and Beren the One-handed⁶ and of the plight of that lady Mavwin his heart became softened and he granted her desire, nor would he send TÃ°rin away, but rather said he: âSon of Ærin, thou shalt dwell sweetly in my woodland court, nor even so as a retainer, but behold as a second child of mine shalt thou be, and all the wisdoms of Gwedheling and of myself shalt thou be taught.â

After a time therefore when the travellers had rested he despatched the younger of the two guardians of TÃ°rin back unto Mavwin, for such was that manâs desire to die in the service of the wife of Ãrin, yet was an escort of Elves sent with him, and such comfort and magics for the journey as could be devised, and moreover these words did he bear from Tinwelint to Mavwin: âBehold O Lady Mavwin wife of Ãrin the Steadfast, not for love nor for fear of Melko but of the wisdom of my heart and the fate of the Valar did I not go with my folk to the Battle of Unnumbered Tears, who now am become a safety and a refuge for all who fearing evil may find the secret ways that lead to the protection of my halls. Perchance now is there no other bulwark left against the arrogance of the Vala of Iron, for men say Turgon is not slain, but who knoweth the truth of it or how long he may escape? Now therefore shall thy son TÃ°rin be fostered here as my own child until he is of age to succour theeâthen, an he will, he may depart.â More too he bid the Lady Mavwin, might she oâercome the journey, fare back also to his halls, and dwell there in peace; but this when she heard she did not do, both for the tenderness of her little child NienÃ³ri, and for that rather would she dwell poor among Men than live sweetly as an almsguest even among the woodland Elves. It may be too that she clung to that dwelling that Ãrin had set her in ere he went to the great war, hoping still faintly for his return, for none of the messengers that had borne the lamentable tidings from that field might say that he was dead, reporting only that none knew where he might beâyet in truth those messengers were few and half-distraught, and now the years were slowly passing since the last blow fell on that most grievous day. Indeed in after days she yearned to look again upon TÃ°rin, and maybe in the end, when NienÃ³ri had grown, had cast aside her pride and fared over the hills, had not these become impassable for the might and great magic of Melko, who hemmed all Men in Hithlum and slew such as dared beyond its walls.

Thus came to pass the dwelling of TÃ°rin in the halls of Tinwelint; and with him was suffered to dwell Gumlin the aged who had fared with him out of Hithlum, and had no heart or strength for the returning. Very much joy had he in that sojourn, yet did the sorrow of his sundering from Mavwin fall never quite away from him; great waxed his strength of body and the stoutness of his feats got him praise wheresoever Tinwelint was held as lord, yet he was a silent boy and often gloomy, and he got not love easily and fortune did not follow him, for few things that he desired greatly came to him and many things at which he laboured went awry. For nothing however did he grieve so much as the ceasing of all messengers between Mavwin and himself, when after a few years as has been told the hills became untraversable and the ways were shut. Now TÃ°rin was seven years old when he fared to the woodland Elves, and seven years he dwelt there while tidings came ever and anon to him from his mother, so that he heard how his sister NienÃ³ri grew to a slender maid and very fair, and how things grew better in Hithlum and his mother more in peace; and then all words ceased, and the years passed.

Â

To ease his sorrow and the rage of his heart, that remembered always how Ã°rin and his folk had gone down in battle against Melko, TÃ°rin was for ever ranging with the most warlike of the folk of Tinwelint far abroad, and long ere he was grown to first manhood he slew and took hurts in frays with the Orcs that prowled unceasingly upon the confines of the realm and were a menace to the Elves. Indeed but for his prowess much hurt had that folk sustained, and he held the wrath of Melko from them for many years, and after his days they were harassed sorely, and in the end must have been cast into thralldom had not such great and dread events befallen that Melko forgot them.

Now about the courts of Tinwelint there dwelt an Elf called Orgof, and he, as were the most of that kingâs folk, was an Ilkorin, yet he had Gnome-blood also. Of his motherâs side he was nearly akin to the king himself, and was in some favour being a good hunter and an Elf of prowess, yet was he somewhat loose with his tongue and overweening by reason of his favour with the king; yet of nothing was he so fain as of fine raiment and of jewels and of gold and silver ornament, and was ever himself clad most bravely. Now TÃ°rin lying continually in the woods and travelling in far and lonely places grew to be uncouth of raiment and wild of locks, and Orgof made jest of him whensoever the twain sat at the kingâs board; but TÃ°rin said never a word to his foolish jesting, and indeed at no time did he give much heed to words that were spoken to him, and the eyes beneath his shaggy brows oftentimes looked as to a great distanceâso that he seemed to see far things and to listen to sounds of the woodland that others heard not.

On a time TÃºrin sate at meat with the king, and it was that day twelve years since he had gazed through his tears upon Mavwin standing before the doors and weeping as he made his way among the trees, until their stems had taken her from his sight, and he was moody, speaking curt answers to those that sat nigh him, and most of all to Orgof.

But this fool would not give him peace, making a laugh of his rough clothes and tangled hair, for TÃºrin had then come new from a long abiding in the woods, and at length he drew forth daintily a comb of gold that he had and offered it to TÃºrin; and having drunk well, when TÃºrin deigned not to notice him he said: âNay, an thou knowst not how to use a comb, hie thee back to thy mother, for she perchance will teach theeâunless in sooth the women of Hithlum be as ugly as their sons and as little kempt.â Then a fierce anger born of his sore heart and these words concerning the lady Mavwin blazed suddenly in TÃºrinâs breast, so that he seized a heavy drinking-vessel of gold that lay by his right hand and unmindful of his strength he cast it with great force in Orgofâs teeth, saying: âStop thy mouth therewith, fool, and prate no more.â But Orgofâs face was broken and he fell back with great weight, striking his head upon the stone of the floor and dragging upon him the table and all its vessels, and he spake nor prated again, for he was dead.

Then all men rose in silence, but TÃºrin, gazing aghast upon the body of Orgof and the spilled wine upon his hand, turned on his heel and strode into the night; and some that were akin to Orgof drew their weapons half from their sheaths, yet none struck, for the king gave no sign but stared stonily upon the body of Orgof, and very great amaze was in his face. But TÃºrin laved his hands in the stream without the doors and burst there into tears, saying: âLo! Is there a curse upon me, for all I do is ill, and now is it so turned that I must flee the house of my fosterfather an outlaw guilty of bloodânor look upon the faces of any I love again.â And in his heart he dared not return to Hithlum lest his mother be bitterly grieved at his disgrace, or perchance he might draw the wrath of the Elves behind him to his folk; wherefore he got himself far away, and when men came to seek him he might not be found.

Yet they did not seek his harm, although he knew it not, for Tinwelint despite his grief and the ill deed pardoned him, and the most of his folk were with him in that, for TÃ°rin had long held his peace or returned courtesy to the folly of Orgof, though stung often enough thereby, for that Elf being not a little jealous was used to barb his words; and now therefore the near kinsmen of Orgof were constrained by fear of Tinwelint and by many gifts to accept the kingâs doom.

Yet TÃ°rin in unhappiness, believing the hand of all against him and the heart of the king become that of a foe, crept to the uttermost bounds of that woodland realm. There he hunted for his subsistence, being a good shot with the bow, yet he rivalled not the Elves at that, for rather at the wielding of the sword was he mightier than they. To him gathered a few wild spirits, and amongst them was Beleg the huntsman, who had rescued Gumlin and TÃ°rin in the woods aforetime. Now in many adventures were those twain together, Beleg the Elf and TÃ°rin the Man, which are not now told or remembered but which once were sung in many a place. With beast and with goblin they warred and fared at times into far places unknown to the Elves, and the fame of the hidden hunters of the marches began to be heard among Orcs and Elves, so that perchance Tinwelint would soon have become aware of the place of TÃ°rinâs abiding, had not upon a time all that band of TÃ°rinâs fallen into desperate encounter with a host of Orcs who outnumbered them three times. All were there slain save TÃ°rin and Beleg, and Beleg escaped with wounds, but TÃ°rin was overborne and bound, for such was the will of Melko that he be brought to him alive; for behold, dwelling in the halls of LinwÃ°⁷ about which had that fay Gwedheling the queen woven much magic and mystery and such power of spells as can come only from Valinor, whence indeed long time ago she once had brought them, TÃ°rin had been lost out of his sight, and he feared lest he cheat the doom that was devised for him. Therefore now he purposed to entreat him grievously before the eyes of Årin; but Årin had called upon the Valar of the West, being taught much concerning them by the Eldar of KÃ°rÃ°the Gnomes he had encounteredâand his words came, who shall say how, to Manwë Sôlimo upon the heights of Taniquetil, the Mountain of the World. Nonetheless was Târin dragged now many an evil league in sore distress, a captive of the pitiless Orcs, and they made slow journeying, for they followed ever the line of dark hills toward those regions where they rise high and gloomy and their heads are shrouded in black vapours. There are they called Angorodin or the Iron Mountains, for beneath the roots of their northernmost fastnesses lies Angband, the Hells of Iron, most grievous of all abodes and thither were they now making laden with booty and with evil deeds.

Know then that in those days still was Hithlum and the Lands Beyond full of the wild Elves and of Noldoli yet free, fugitives of the old battle; and some wandered ever wearily, and others had secret and hidden abodes in caves or woodland fastnesses, but Melko sought untiringly after them and most pitilessly did he entreat them of all his thralls did he capture them. Orcs and dragons and evil fays were loosed against them and their lives were full of sorrow and travail, so that those who found not in the end the realms of Tinwelint nor the secret stronghold of the king of the city of stone* perished or were enslaved.

Noldoli too there were who were under the evil enchantments of Melko and wandered as in a dream of fear, doing his ill bidding, for the spell of bottomless dread was on them and they felt the eyes of Melko burn them from afar. Yet often did these sad Elves both thrall and free hear the voice of Ulmo in the streams or by the sea-marge where the waters of Sirion mingled with the waves; for Ulmo, of all the Valar, still thought of them most tenderly and designed with their slender aid to bring Melko's evil to ruin. Then remembering the blessedness of Valinor would they at times cast away their fear, doing good deeds and aiding both Elves and Men against the Lord of Iron.

Now was it that it came into the heart of Beleg the hunter of the Elves to seek after Târin so soon as his own hurts were healed. This being done in no great number of days, for he had a skill of healing, he made all speed after the band of Orcs, and he had need of all his craft as tracker to follow that trail, for a band of the goblins of Melko go cunningly and very light. Soon was he far beyond any regions known to him, yet for love of Târin he pressed on, and in this did he show courage greater than the most of that woodland folk, and indeed there are none who may now measure the depth of fear and anguish that Melko set in the hearts of Men and of Elves in those sad days. Thus did it fall out that Beleg became lost and benighted in a dark and perilous region so thick with pines of giant growth that none but the goblins might find a track, having eyes that pierced the deepest gloom, yet were many even of these lost long time in those regions; and they were called by the Noldoli Taurfuin, the Forest of Night. Now giving himself up for lost Beleg lay with his back to a mighty tree and listened to the wind in the gaunt tops of the forest many fathoms above him, and the moaning of the night airs and the creaking of the branches was full of sorrow and foreboding, and his heart became utterly weary.

On a sudden he noticed a little light afar among the trees steady and pale as it were of a glowworm very bright, yet thinking it might scarce be glowworm in such a place he crept towards it. Now the Noldoli that laboured in the earth and aforetime had skill of crafts in metals and gems in Valinor were the most valued of the thralls of Melko, and he suffered them not to stray far away, and so it was that Beleg knew not that these Elves had little lanterns of strange fashion, and they were of silver and of crystal and a flame of a pale blue burnt forever within, and this was a secret and the jewel-makers among them alone knew it nor would they reveal it even to Melko, albeit many jewels and many magic lights they were constrained to make for him.

Aided by these lamps the Noldoli fared much at night, and seldom lost a path had they but once trodden it before. So it was that drawing near Beleg beheld one of the hill-gnomes stretched upon the needles beneath a great pine asleep, and his blue lantern stood glimmering nigh his head. Then Beleg awakened him, and that Elf started up in great fear and anguish, and Beleg learned that he was a fugitive from the mines of Melko and named himself Flinding bo-Dhuilin of an ancient house of the Gnomes. Now falling into talk Flinding was overjoyed to have speech with a free Noldo, and told many tales of his flight from the uttermost fastness of the mines of Melko; and at length said he: "When I thought myself all but free, lo, I strayed at night unwarily into the midmost of an Orc-camp, and they were asleep and much spoil and weighted packs they had, and many captive

Elves I thought I descried: and one there was that lay nigh to a trunk to which he was bound most grievously, and he moaned and cried out bitterly against Melko, calling on the names of Ārin and Mavwin; and though at that time being a craven from long captivity I fled heedlessly, now do I marvel much, for who of the thralls of Angband has not known of Ārin the Steadfast who alone of Men defies Melko chained in torment upon a bitter peak?â

Then was Beleg in great eagerness and sprang to his feet shouting: âTis TÃ°rin, fosterson of Tinwelint, even he whom I seek, who was the son of Ārin long ago.âNay, lead me to this camp, O son of Duilin, and soon shall he be free,â but Flinding was much afeared, saying: âSofter words, my Beleg, for the Orcs have ears of cats, and though a dayâs march lies between me and that encampment who knows whether they be not followed after.â

Nonetheless hearing the story of TÃ°rin from Beleg, despite his dread he consented to lead Beleg to that place, and long ere the sun rose on the day or its fainting beams crept into that dark forest they were upon the road, guided by the dancing light of Flindingâs swinging lamp. Now it happened that in their journeying their paths crossed that of the Orcs who now were renewing their march, but in a direction other than that they had for long pursued, for now fearing the escape of their prisoner they made for a place where they knew the trees were thinner and a track ran for many a league easy to pursue; wherefore that evening, or ever they came to the spot that Flinding sought, they heard a shouting and a rough singing that was afar in the woods but drawing near; nor did they hide too soon ere the whole of that Orc-band passed nigh to them, and some of the captains were mounted upon small horses, and to one of these was TÃ°rin tied by the wrists so that he must trot or be dragged cruelly. Then did Beleg and Flinding follow timorously after as dusk fell on the forest, and when that band encamped they lurked near until all was quiet save the moaning of the captives. Now Flinding covered his lamp with a pelt and they crept near, and behold the goblins slept, for it was not their wont to keep fire or watch in their bivouacs, and for guard they trusted to certain fierce wolves that went always with their bands as dogs with Men, but slept not when they camped, and their eyes shone like points of red light among the trees. Now was Flinding in sore dread, but Beleg bid him follow, and the two crept between the wolves at a point where there was a great gap between them, and as the luck of the Valar had it TÃ°rin was lying nigh, apart from the others, and Beleg came unseen to his side and would cut his bonds, when he found his knife had dropped from his side in his creeping and his sword he had left behind without the camp. Therefore now, for they dare not risk the creeping forth and back again, do Beleg and Flinding both stout men essay to carry him sleeping soundly in utter weariness stealthily from the camp, and this they did, and it has ever been thought a great feat, and few have done the like in passing the wolf guards of the goblins and despoiling their camps.

Now in the woods at no great distance from the camp they laid him down, for they might not bear him further, seeing that he was a Man and of greater stature than they;⁸ but Beleg fetched his sword and would cut his bonds forthwith. The bonds about his wrists he severed first and was cutting those upon the ankles when blundering in the dark he pricked TÃ°rinâs foot deeply, and TÃ°rin awoke in fear. Now seeing a form bend over him in the gloom sword in hand and feeling the smart of his foot he thought it was one of the Orcs come to slay him or to torment himâand this they did often, cutting him with knives or hurting him with spears; but now TÃ°rin feeling his hand free leapt up and flung all his weight suddenly upon Beleg, who fell and was half-crushed, lying speechless on the ground; but TÃ°rin at the same time seized the sword and struck it through Belegâs throat or ever Flinding might know what had betid. Then TÃ°rin leapt back and shouting out curses upon the goblins bid them come and slay him or taste of his sword, for he fancied himself in the midst of their camp, and thought not of flight but only of selling his life dear. Now would he have made at Flinding, but that Gnome sprang back, dropping his lamp, so that its cover slipped and the light of it shone forth, and he called out in the tongue of the Gnomes that TÃ°rin should hold his hand and slay not his friendsâthen did TÃ°rin hearing his speech pause, and as he stood, by the light of the lamp he saw the white face of Beleg lying nigh his feet with pierced throat, and he stood as one stricken to stone, and such was the look upon his face that Flinding dared not speak for a long while. Indeed little mind had he for words, for by that light had he also seen the fate of Beleg and was very bitter in heart. At length however it seemed to Flinding that the Orcs were astir, and so it was, for the shouts of TÃ°rin had come to them; wherefore he said to TÃ°rin: âThe Orcs are upon us, let us flee,â but TÃ°rin answered not, and Flinding shook him, bidding him gather his wits or perish, and then TÃ°rin did as he was bid but yet as one dazed, and stooping he raised Beleg and kissed his mouth.

Then did Flinding guide TÃ°rin as well as he might swiftly from those regions, and TÃ°rin wandered with him following as he led, and at length for a while they had shaken off pursuit and could breathe again. Now then did Flinding have space to tell TÃ°rin all he knew and of his meeting with Beleg, and the floods of TÃ°rinâs tears were loosed, and he wept bitterly, for Beleg had been his comrade often in many deeds; and this was the third anguish that befell TÃ°rin, nor did he lose the mark of that sorrow utterly in all his life; and long he wandered with Flinding caring little whither he went, and but for that Gnome soon would he have been recaptured or lost, for he thought only of the stark face of Beleg the huntsman, lying in the dark forest slain by his hand even as he cut the bonds of thralldom from him.

In that time was TÃ°rinâs hair touched with grey, despite his few years. Long time however did TÃ°rin and the Noldo journey together, and by reason of the magic of that lamp fared by night and hid by day and were lost in the hills, and the Orcs found them not.

Â

Now in the mountains there was a place of caves above a stream, and that stream ran down to feed the river Sirion, but grass grew before the doors of the caves, and these were cunningly concealed by trees and such magics as those scattered bands that dwelt therein remembered still. Indeed at this time this place had grown to be a strong dwelling of the folk and many a fugitive swelled them, and there the ancient arts and works of the Noldoli came once more to life albeit in a rude and rugged fashion.

There was smithying in secret and forging of good weapons, and even fashioning of some fair things beside, and the women spun once more and wove, and at times was gold quarried privily in places nigh, where it was found, so that deep in those caverns might vessels of beauty be seen in the flame of secret lights, and old songs were faintly sung. Yet did the dwellers in the caves flee always before the Orcs and never give battle unless compelled by mischance or were they able to so entrap them that all might be slain and none escape alive; and this they did of policy that no tidings reach Melko of their dwelling nor might he suspect any numerous gathering of folk in those parts.

This place however was known to the Noldo Flinding who fared with TÃ°rin; indeed he was once of that people long since, before the Orcs captured him and he was held in thraldom. Thither did he now wend being sure that the pursuit came no longer nigh them, yet went he nonetheless by devious ways, so that it was long ere they drew nigh to that region, and the spies and watchers of the Rodothlim (for so were that folk named) gave warning of their approach, and the folk withdrew before them, such as were abroad from their dwelling. Then they closed their doors and hoped that the strangers might not discover their caves, for they feared and mistrusted all unknown folk of whatever race, so evil were the lessons of that dreadful time.

Now then Flinding and TÃ°rin dared even to the cavesâ€™ mouths, and perceiving that these twain knew now the paths thereto the Rodothlim sallied and made them prisoners and drew them within their rocky halls, and they were led before the chief, Orodreth. Now the free Noldoli at that time feared much those of their kin who had tasted thraldom, for compelled by fear and torture and spells much treachery had they wrought; even thus did the evil deeds of the Gnomes at CÃ°pas Alqalunten find vengeance,⁹ setting Gnome against Gnome, and the Noldoli cursed the day that ever they first hearkened to the deceit of Melko, rueing utterly their departure from the blessed realm of Valinor.

Nonetheless when Orodreth heard the tale of Flinding and knew it to be true he welcomed him with joy back among the folk, yet was that Gnome so changed by the anguish of his slavery that few knew him again; but for Flindingâ€™s sake Orodreth hearkened to the tale of TÃ°rin, and TÃ°rin told of his travails and named Ã°rin as his sire, nor had the Gnomes yet forgot that name. Then was the heart of Orodreth made kind and he bade them dwell among the Rodothlim and be faithful to him.

So came the sojourn of TÃ°rin among the people of the caves, and he dwelt with Flinding bo-Dhuilin and laboured much for the good of the folk, and slew many a wandering Orc, and did doughty deeds in their defence. In return much did he learn of new wisdom from them, for memories of Valinor burnt yet deep in their wild hearts, and greater still was their wisdom than that of such Eldar as had seen never the blest faces of the Gods.

Among that people was a very fair maiden and she was named Failivrin, and her father was Galweg; and this Gnome had a liking for TÃ°rin and aided him much, and TÃ°rin was often with him in ventures and good deeds. Now many a tale of these did Galweg make beside his hearth and TÃ°rin was often at his board, and the heart of Failivrin became moved at the sight of him, and wondered often at his gloom and sadness, pondering what sorrow lay locked in his breast, for TÃ°rin went not gaily being weighted with the death of Beleg that he felt upon his head, and he suffered not his heart to be moved, although he was glad of her sweetness; but he deemed himself an outlawed man and one burdened with a heavy doom of ill. Therefore did Failivrin become sorrowful and wept in secret, and she grew so pale that folk marvelled at the whiteness and delicacy of her face and her bright eyes that shone therein.

Now came a time when the Orc-bands and the evil things of Melko drew ever nigher to the dwelling of this folk, and despite the good spells that ran in the stream beneath it seemed like that their abode would remain no longer hidden. It is said however that during all this time the dwelling of TÃ°rin in the caves and his deeds among the Rodothlim were veiled from Melkoâs eyes, and that he infested not the Rodothlim for TÃ°rinâs sake nor out of design, but rather it was the ever increasing numbers of these creatures and their growing power and fierceness that brought them so far afield. Nonetheless the blindness and ill-fortune that he wove of old clung yet to TÃ°rin, as may be seen.

Each day grew the brows of the chiefs of the Rodothlim more dark, and dreams came to them¹⁰ bidding them arise and depart swiftly and secretly, seeking, if it might be, after Turgon, for with him might yet salvation be found for the Gnomes. Whispers too there were in the stream at eve, and those among them skilled to hear such voices added their foreboding at the councils of the folk. Now at these councils had TÃ°rin won him a place by dint of many valorous deeds, and he gainsaid their fears, trusting in his strength, for he lusted ever for war with the creatures of Melko, and he upbraided the men of the folk, saying: "Lo! Ye have weapons of great excellence of workmanship, and yet are the most of them clean of your foes' blood. Remember ye the Battle of Uncounted Tears and forget not your folk that there fell, nor seek ever to flee, but fight and stand."

Now despite the wisdom of their wisest such bitter words confused their counsels and delayed them, and there were no few of the stout-hearted that found hope in them, being sad at the thought of abandoning those places where they had begun to make an abiding place of peace and goodliness; but Târin begged Orodreth for a sword, and he had not wielded a sword since the slaying of Beleg, but rather had he been contented with a mighty club. Now then Orodreth let fashion for him a great sword, and it was made by magic to be utterly black save at its edges, and those were shining bright and sharp as but Gnome-steel may be. Heavy it was, and was sheathed in black, and it hung from a sable belt, and Târin named it Gurtholfin the Wand of Death; and often that blade leapt in his hand of its own lust, and it is said that at times it spake dark words to him. Therewith did he now range the hills, and slew unceasingly, so that Blacksword of the Rodothlim became a name of terror to the Orcs, and for a great season all evil was fended from the caverns of the Gnomes. Hence comes that name of Târinâs among the Gnomes, calling him Mormagli or Mormakil according to their speech, for these names signify black sword.

The greater however did Târinâs valour become so grew the love of Failivrin more deep, and did men murmur against him in his absence she spake for him, and sought ever to minister to him, and her he treated ever courteously and happily, saying he had found a fair sister in the Gnome-lands. By Târinâs deeds however was the ancient counsel of the Rodothlim set aside and their abode made known far and wide, nor was Melko ignorant of it, yet many of the Noldoli now fled to them and their strength waxed and Târin was held in great honour among them. Then were days of great happiness and for a while men lived openly again and might fare far abroad from their homes in safety, and many boasted of the salvation of the Noldoli, while Melko gathered in secret his great hordes. These did he loose suddenly upon them at unawares, and they gathered their warriors in great haste and went against him, but behold, an army of Orcs descended upon them, and wolves, and Orcs mounted upon wolves; and a great worm was with them whose scales were polished bronze and whose breath was a mingled fire and smoke, and his name was Glorund.¹¹ All the men of the Rodothlim fell or were taken in that battle, for the foe was numberless, and that was the most bitter affray since the evil field of N  nin-Udathriol.* Orodreth was there sorely hurt and T   rin bore him out of the fight ere yet all was ended, and with the aid of Flinding whose wounds were not great¹² he got him to the caves.

There died Orodreth, reproaching T   rin that he had ever withstood his wise counsels, and T   rin  s heart was bitter at the ruin of the folk that was set to his account.¹³ Then leaving Lord Orodreth dead T   rin went to the places of Galweg  s abiding, and there was Failivrin weeping bitterly at the tidings of her father  s death, but T   rin sought to comfort her, and for the pain of her heart and the sorrow of her father  s death and of the ruin of her folk she swooned upon his breast and cast her arms about him. So deep was the ruth of T   rin  s heart that in that hour he deemed he loved her very dearly; yet were now he and Flinding alone save for a few aged carles and dying men, and the Orcs having despoiled the field of dead were nigh upon them.

Thus stood T   rin before the doors with Gurtholfin in hand, and Flinding was beside him; and the Orcs fell on that place and ransacked it utterly, dragging out all the folk that lurked therein and all their goods, whatsoever of great or little worth might there lie hid. But T   rin denied the entrance of Galweg  s dwelling to them, and they fell thick about him, until a company of their archers standing at a distance shot a cloud of arrows at him. Now he wore chainmail such as all the warriors of the Gnomes have ever loved and still do wear, yet it turned not all those ill shafts, and already was he sore hurt when Flinding fell pierced suddenly through the eye; and soon too had he met his death  and his weird had been the happier thereby  had not that great drake coming now upon the sack bidden them cease their shooting; but with the power of his breath he drove T   rin from those doors and with the magic of his eyes he bound him hand and foot.

Now those drakes and worms are the evillest creatures that Melko has made, and the most uncouth, yet of all are they the most powerful, save it be the Balrogs only. A great cunning and wisdom have they, so that it has been long said amongst Men that whosoever might taste the heart of a dragon would know all tongues of Gods or Men, of birds or beasts, and his ears would catch whispers of the Valar or of Melko such as never had he heard before. Few have there been that ever achieved a deed of such prowess as the slaying of a drake, nor might any even of such doughty ones taste their blood and live, for it is as a poison of fires that slays all save the most godlike in strength. Howso that may be, even as their lord these foul beasts love lies and lust after gold and precious things with a great fierceness of desire, albeit they may not use nor enjoy them.

Thus was it that this Lā̃kĀ (for so do the Eldar name the worms of Melko) suffered the Orcs to slay whom they would and to gather whom they listed into a very great and very sorrowful throng of women, maids, and little children, but all the mighty treasure that they had brought from the rocky halls and heaped glistering in the sun before the doors he coveted for himself and forbade them set finger on it, and they durst not withstand him, nor could they have done so an they would.

In that sad band stood Failivrin in horror, and she stretched out her arms towards TĀ̃rin, but TĀ̃rin was held by the spell of the drake, for that beast had a foul magic in his glance, as have many others of his kind, and he turned the sinews of TĀ̃rin as it were to stone, for his eye held TĀ̃rin's eye so that his will died, and he could not stir of his own purpose, yet might he see and hear.

Then did Glorund taunt TĀ̃rin nigh to madness, saying that lo! he had cast away his sword nor had the heart to strike a blow for his friends—now TĀ̃rin's sword lay at his feet whither it had slipped from his unnerv'd grasp. Great was the agony of TĀ̃rin's heart thereat, and the Orcs laughed at him, and of the captives some cried bitterly against him. Even now did the Orcs begin to drive away that host of thralls, and his heart broke at the sight, yet he moved not; and the pale face of Failivrin faded afar, and her voice was borne to him crying: “O TĀ̃rin Mormakil, where is thy heart; O my beloved, wherefore dost thou forsake me?” So great then became TĀ̃rin's anguish that even the spell of that worm might not restrain it, and crying aloud he reached for the sword at his feet and would wound the drake with it, but the serpent breathed a foul and heated breath upon him, so that he swooned and thought that it was death.

A long time thereafter, and the tale telleth not how long, he came to himself, and he was lying gazing at the sun before the doors, and his head rested against a heap of gold even as the ransackers had left it. Then said the drake, who was hard by: âWonderest thou not wherefore I have withheld death from thee, O TÃ°rin Mormakil, who wast once named brave?â Then TÃ°rin remembered all his griefs and the evil that had fallen upon him, and he said: âTaunt me not, foul worm, for thou knowest I would die; and for that alone, methinks, thou slayest me not.â

But the drake answered saying: âKnow then this, O TÃ°rin son of Årin, that a fate of evil is woven about thee, and thou mayst not untangle thy footsteps from it whitherever thou goest. Yea indeed, I would not have thee slain, for thus wouldst thou escape very bitter sorrows and a weird of anguish.â Then TÃ°rin leaping suddenly to his feet and avoiding that beastâs baleful eye raised aloft his sword and cried: âNay, from this hour shall none name me TÃ°rin if I live. Behold, I will name me a new name and it shall be Turambar!â Now this meaneth Conqueror of Fate, and the form of the name in the Gnome-speech is Turumart. Then uttering these words he made a second time at the drake, thinking indeed to force the drake to slay him and to conquer his fate by death, but the dragon laughed, saying: âThou fool! An I would, I had slain thee long since and could do so here and now, and if I will not thou canst not do battle with me waking, for my eye can cast once more the binding spell upon thee that thou stand as stone. Nay, get thee gone, O Turambar Conqueror of Fate! First thou must meet thy doom an thou wouldst oâercome it.â But Turambar was filled with shame and anger, and perchance he had slain himself, so great was his madness, although thus might he not hope that ever his spirit would be freed from the dark glooms of Mandos or stray into the pleasant paths of Valinor;¹⁴ but amidst his misery he bethought him of Failivrinâs pallid face and he bowed his head, for the thought came into his heart to seek back through all the woods after her sad footsteps even be it to Angamandi and the Hills of Iron. Maybe in that desperate venture he had found a kindly and swift death or perchance an ill one, and maybe he had rescued Failivrin and found happiness, yet not thus was he fated to earn the name he had taken anew, and the drake reading his mind suffered him not thus lightly to escape his tide of ill.

“Hearken to me, O son of Ærin,” said he; “ever wast thou a coward at heart, vaunting thyself falsely before men. Perchance thou thinkest it a gallant deed to go follow after a maiden of strange kin, recking little of thine own that suffer now terrible things? Behold, Mavwin who loves thee long has eagerly awaited thy return, knowing that thou hast found manhood a while ago, and she looks for thy succour in vain, for little she knows that her son is an outlaw stained with the blood of his comrades, a defiler of his lord’s table. Ill do men entreat her, and behold the Orcs infest now those parts of Hithlum, and she is in fear and peril and her daughter Nien³ri thy sister with her.”

Then was Turambar aflame with sorrow and with shame for the lies of that worm were barbed with truth, and for the spell of his eyes he believed all that was said. Therefore his old desire to see once more Mavwin his mother and to look upon Nien³ri whom he had never seen since his first days¹⁵ grew hot within him, and with a heart torn with sorrow for the fate of Failivrin he turned his feet towards the hills seeking Dor L³min, and his sword was sheathed. And truly is it said: “Forsake not for anything thy friends nor believe those who counsel thee to do so for of his abandoning of Failivrin in danger that he himself could see came the very direst evil upon him and all he loved; and indeed his heart was confounded and wavered, and he left those places in uttermost shame and weariness. But the dragon gloated upon the hoard and lay coiled upon it, and the fame of that great treasure of golden vessels and of unwrought gold that lay by the caves above the stream fared far and wide about; yet the great worm slept before it, and evil thoughts he had as he pondered the planting of his cunning lies and the sprouting thereof and their growth and fruit, and fumes of smoke went up from his nostrils as he slept.

Â

On a time therefore long afterward came Turambar with great travail into Hisil³m³«, and found at length the place of the abode of his mother, even the one whence he had been sundered as a child, but behold, it was roofless and the tilth about it ran wild. Then his heart smote him, but he learned of some that dwelt nigh that lighting on better days the Lady Mavwin had departed some years ago to places not far distant where was a great and prosperous dwelling of men, for that region of HisilÃ³mÃ« was fertile and men tilled the land somewhat and many had flocks and herds, though for the most part in the dark days after the great battle men feared to dwell in settled places and ranged the woods and hunted or fished, and so it was with those kindreds about the waters of Asgon whence after arose Tuor son of Peleg.

Hearing these words however Turambar was amazed, and questioned them concerning the wandering into those regions of Orcs and other fierce folk of Melko, but they shook their heads, and said that never had such creatures come hither deep into the land of HisilÃ³mÃ«. ¹⁶ âIf thou wishest for Orcs then go to the hills that encompass our land about,â said they, âand thou wilt not search long. Scarce may the wariest fare in and out so constant is their watch, and they infest the rocky gates of the land that the Children of Men be penned for ever in the Land of Shadows; but men say âtis the will of Melko that they trouble us not hereâand yet it seems to us that thou hast come from afar, and at this we marvel, for long is it since one from other lands might tread this way.â Then Turambar was in perplexity at this and he doubted the deceit of the dragonâs words, yet he went now in hope to the dwelling of men and the house of his mother, and coming upon homesteads of men he was easily directed thither. Now men looked strangely at his questioning, and indeed they had reason, yet were such as he spoke to in great awe and wonder at him and shrank back from speech with him, for his garb was of the wild woods and his hair was long and his face haggard and drawn as with unquenchable sorrows, and therein burnt fiercely his dark eyes beneath dark brows. A collar of fine gold he wore and his mighty sword was at his side, and men marvelled much at him; and did any dare to question him he named himself Turambar son of the weary forest,* and that seemed but the more strange to them.

Now came he to the dwelling of Mavwin, and behold it was a fair house, but none dwelt there, and grass was high in the gardens, and there were no kine in the byres nor horses in the sheds, and the pastures about were silent and empty. Only the swallows had dwelling beneath the timbers of the eaves and these made a noise and a bustle as if departure for autumn was at hand, and Turambar sat before the carven doors and wept. And one who was passing on to other dwellings, for a track passed nigh to that homestead, espied him, and coming asked him his grief, and Turambar said that it was bitter for a son sundered for many years from his home to give up all that was dear and dare the dangers of the infested hills to find only the halls of his kindred empty when he returned at last.

âNay, then this is a very trick of Melkoâs,â said the other, âfor of a truth here dwelt the Lady Mavwin wife of Ærin, and yet is she gone two years past very secretly and suddenly, and men say that she seeks her son who is lost, and that her daughter Nien-ri goes with her, but I know not the story. This however I know, and many about here do likewise, and cry shame thereon, for know that the guardianship of all her goods and land she gave to Brodda, a man whom she trusted, and he is lord of these regions by menâs consent and has to wife a kinswoman of hers. But now she is long away he has mingled her herds and flocks, small as they were, with his mighty ones, branding them with his own marks, yet the dwelling and stead of Mavwin he suffereth to fall to ruin, and men think ill of it but move not, for the power of Brodda has grown to be great.â

Then Turambar begged him to set his feet upon the paths to Broddaâs halls, and the man did as he desired, so that Turambar striding thither came upon them just as night fell and men sat to meat in that house. Great was the company that night and the light of many torches fell upon them, but the Lady Airin was not there, for men drank overmuch at Broddaâs feasts and their songs were fierce and quarrels blazed about the hall, and those things she loved not. Now Turambar smote upon the gates and his heart was black and a great wrath was in him, for the words of the stranger before his motherâs doors were bitter to him.

Then did some open to his knocking and Turambar strode into that hall, and Brodda bade him be seated and ordered wine and meats to be set before him, but Turambar would neither eat nor drink, so that men looking askance upon his sullenness asked him who he might be. Then Turambar stepping out into the midst of them before the high place where Brodda sat said:

Behold, I am Turambar son of the forest, and men laughed thereat, but Turambar's eyes were full of wrath. Then said Brodda in doubt: "What wilt thou of me, O son of the wild forest?" But Turambar said: "Lord Brodda, I am come to repay thy stewardship of others' goods," and silence fell in that place; but Brodda laughed, saying again: "But who art thou?" And thereupon Turambar leapt upon the high place and ere Brodda might foresee the act he drew Gurtholfin and seizing Brodda by the locks all but smote his head from off his body, crying aloud: "So dieth the rich man who addeth the widow's little to his much. Lo, men die not all in the wild woods, and am I not in truth the son of Árin, who having sought back unto his folk findeth an empty hall despoiled." Then was there a great uproar in that hall, and indeed though he was burdened overmuch with his many griefs and wellnigh distraught, yet was this deed of Turambar violent and unlawful. Some were there nonetheless that would not unsheathe their weapons, saying that Brodda was a thief and died as one, but many there were that leapt with swords against Turambar and he was hard put to it, and one man he slew, and it was Orlin. Then came Airin of the long hair in great fear into the halls and at her voice men stayed their hands; but great was her horror when she saw the deeds that were done, and Turambar turned his face away and might not look upon her, for his wrath was grown cold and he was sick and weary.

But she hearing the tale said: "Nay, grieve not for me, son of Árin, but for thyself; for my lord was a hard lord and cruel and unjust, and men might say somewhat in thy defence, yet behold thou hast slain him now at his board being his guest, and Orlin thou hast slain who is of thy mother's kin; and what shall be thy doom?" At those words some were silent and many shouted "death," but Airin said that it was not wholly in accord with the laws of that place, "for," said she, "Brodda was slain wrongfully, yet just was the wrath of the slayer, and Orlin too did he slay in defence, though it were in the hall of a feast. Yet now I fear that this man must get him swiftly from among us nor ever set foot upon these lands again, else shall any man slay him; but those lands and goods that were Árin's shall Brodda's kin hold, save only do Mavwin and Nienrí return ever from their wandering, yet even so may Tárin son of Árin inherit nor part nor parcel of them ever." Now this doom seemed just to all save Turambar, and they marvelled at the equity of Airin whose lord lay slain, and they guessed not at the horror of her life aforetime with that man; but Turambar cast his sword upon the floor and bade them slay him, yet they would not for the words of Airin whom they loved, and Airin suffered it not for the love of Mavwin, hoping yet to join those twain mother and son in happiness, and her doom she had made to satisfy men's anger and save TÃ°rin from death. âNay,â said she, âthree days do I give thee to get thee out of the land, wherefore go!â and Turambar lifting his sword wiped it, saying: âWould I were clean of his blood,â and he went forth into the night. In the folly of his heart now did he deem himself cut off in truth for ever from Mavwin his mother, thinking that never again would any he loved be fain to look upon him. Then did he thirst for news of his mother and sister and of none might he ask, but wandered back over the hills knowing only that they sought him still perchance in the forests of the Lands Beyond, and no more did he know for a long while.

Of his wanderings thereafter has no tale told, save that after much roaming his sorrow grew dulled and his heart dead, until at last in places very far away many a journey beyond the river of the Rodothlim he fell in with some huntsmen of the woods, and these were Men. Some of that company were thanes of Ãrin, or sons of them, and they had wandered darkly ever since that Battle of Tears, but now did Turambar join their number, and built his life anew so well as he might. Now that people had houses in a more smiling region of the woods in lands that were not utterly far from Sirion or the grassy hills of that river's middle course, and they were hardy men and bowed not to Melko, and Turambar got honour among them.

Â

Now is it to tell that far other had matters fallen out with Mavwin than the FoalÃ³kÃ« had said to TÃ°rin, for her days turning to better she had peace and honour among the men of those regions. Nonetheless her grief at the loss of her son by reason of the cutting off of all messengers deepened only with the years, albeit NienÃ³ri grew to a most fair and slender maid. At the time of TÃ°rin's flight from the halls of Tinwelint she was already twelve¹⁷ years old and tall and beautiful.

Now the tale tells not the number of days that Turambar sojourned with the Rodothlim but these were very many, and during that time Nien³ri grew to the threshold of womanhood, and often was there speech between her and her mother of T^orin that was lost. In the halls of Tinwelint too the memory of T^orin lived still, and there still abode Gumlin, now decrepit in years, who aforetime had been the guardian of T^orinâs childhood upon that first journey to the Lands Beyond. Now was Gumlin white-haired and the years were heavy on him, but he longed sorely for a sight once more of the folk of Men and of the Lady Mavwin his mistress. On a time then Gumlin learnt of the withdrawal from the hills of the greater number of those Orc-bands and other fierce beings of Melkoâs that had for so long made them impassable to Elves and Men. Now for a space were the hills and the paths that led over them far and wide free of his evil, for Melko had at that time a great and terrible project afoot, and that was the destruction of the Rodothlim and of many dwellings of the Gnomes beside, that his spies had revealed,¹⁸ yet all the folk of those regions breathed the freer for a while, though had they known all perchance they had not done so.

Then Gumlin the aged fell to his knees before Tinwelint and begged that he suffer him to depart homeward, that he might see his mistress of old ere death took him to the halls of Mandosâif indeed that lady had not fared thither before him. Then the king¹⁹ said yea, and for his journey he gave him two guides for the succouring of his age; yet those three, Gumlin and the woodland Elves, made a very hard journey, for it was late winter, and yet would Gumlin by no means abide until spring should come.

Now as they drew nigh to that region of Hisil³m³« where aforetime Mavwin had dwelt and nigh where she dwelt yet a great snow fell, as happened oft in those parts on days that should rather have been ones of early spring. Therein was Gumlin whelmed, and his guides seeking aid came unawares upon Mavwinâs house, and calling for aid of her were granted it. Then by the aid of the folk of Mavwin was Gumlin found and carried to the house and warmed back to life, and coming to himself at length he knew Mavwin and was very joyful.

Now when he was in part healed he told his tale to Mavwin, and as he recounted the years and the doughtiest of the feats of T^orin she was glad, but great was her sorrow and dismay at the tidings of his sundering from LinwÃ«²⁰ and the manner of it, and going from Gumlin she wept bitterly. Indeed for long and since ever she knew that TÃ°rin, an he lived, had grown to manhood she had wondered that he sought not back to her, and often dread had filled her heart lest attempting this he had perished in the hills; but now the truth was bitter to bear and she was desolate for a great while, nor might NienÃ³ri comfort her.

Now by reason of the unkindness of the weather those guides that had brought Gumlin out of Tinwelintâs realms abode as her guests until spring came, but with springâs first coming Gumlin died.

Then arose Mavwin and going to several of the chiefs of those places she besought their aid, telling them the tale of TÃ°rinâs fate as Gumlin had told it to her. But some laughed, saying she was deceived by the babblings of a dying man, and the most said that she was distraught with grief, and that it would be a foolâs counsel to seek beyond the hills a man who had been lost for years ago: ânor,â said they, âwill we lend man or horse to such a quest, for all our love for thee, O Mavwin wife of Ãrin.â

Then Mavwin departed in tears but railed not at them, for she had scant hope in her plea and knew that wisdom was in their words. Nonetheless being unable to rest she came now to those guides of the Elves, who chafed already to be away beneath the sun; and she said to them: âLead me now to your lord,â and they would dissuade her, saying that the road was no road for a womanâs feet to tread; yet she did not heed them. Rather did she beg of her friend whose name was Airin Faiglindra* (long-tressed) and was wed to Brodda a lord of that region, and rich and powerful, that NienÃ³ri might be taken under the guardianship of her husband and all her goods thereto. This did Airin obtain of Brodda without great pleading, and when she knew this she would take farewell of her daughter; but her plan availed little, for NienÃ³ri stood before her mother and said: âEither thou goest not, O Mavwin my mother, or go we both,â nor would anything turn her from those words. Therefore in the end did both mother and daughter make them ready for that sore journey, and the guides murmured much thereat. Yet it so happened that the season which followed that bitter winter was very kindly, and despite the forebodings of the guides the four passed the hills and made their long journey with no greater evils than hunger and thirst.

Coming therefore at length before Tinwelint Mavwin cast herself down and wept, begging pardon for TÃ°rin and compassion and aid for herself and NienÃ³ri; but Tinwelint bade her arise and seat herself beside Gwedheling his queen, saying: âLong years ago was TÃ°rin thy son forgiven, aye, even as he left these halls, and many a weary search have we made for him. No outlawry of mine was it that took him from this realm, but remorse and bitterness drew him to the wilds, and there, methinks, evil things oâertook him, or an he lives yet I fear me it is in bondage to the Orcs.â Then Mavwin wept again and implored the king to give her aid, for she said: âYea verily I would fare until the flesh of my feet were worn away, if haply at the journeyâs end I might see the face of TÃ°rin son of Ãrin my well-beloved.â But the king said that he knew not whither she might seek her son save in Angamandi, and thither he might not send any of his lieges, not though his heart were full of ruth for the sorrow of Ãrinâs folk. Indeed Tinwelint spoke but as he believed just, nor meant he to add to Mavwinâs sorrow save only to restrain her from so mad and deadly a quest, but Mavwin hearing him spake no word more, and going from him went out into the woods and suffered no one to stay her, and only NienÃ³ri followed her whithersoever she went.

Now the folk of Tinwelint looked with pity on those twain and with kindness, and secretly they watched them, and unbeknown kept much harm from them, so that the wandering ladies of the woods became familiar among them and dear to many, yet were they a sight of ruth, and folk swore hatred to Melko and his works who saw them pass. Thus came it that after many moons Mavwin fell in with a band of wandering Gnomes, and entering into discourse with them the tale was told to her of the Rodothlim, such as those Gnomes knew of it, and of the dwelling of TÃ°rin among them. Of the whelming of that abode of folk by the hosts of Melko and by the dragon Glorund they told too, for those deeds were then new and their fame went far and wide. Now TÃ°rin they named not by name, calling him Mormakil, a wild man who fled from the face of Tinwelint and escaped thereafter from the hands of the Orcs.

Then was the heart of Mavwin filled with hope and she questioned them more, but the Noldoli said that they had not heard that any came alive out of that ransacking save such as were haled to Angamandi, and then again was Mavwinâs hope dashed low. Yet did she nonetheless get her back to the kingâs halls, and telling her tale besought his aid against the FoalÃ³kÃ«. Now it was Mavwinâs thought that perchance TÃ³rin dwelt yet in the thraldom of the dragon and it might fall to them in some manner to liberate him, or again should the prowess of the kingâs men suffice then might they slay the worm in vengeance for his evils, and so at his death might he speak words of knowledge concerning the fate of TÃ³rin, were he indeed no longer nigh the caverns of the Rodothlim. Of the mighty hoard that that worm guarded Mavwin recked little, but she spoke much of it to Tinwelint, even as the Noldoli had spoken of it to her. Now the folk of Tinwelint were of the woodlands and had scant wealth, yet did they love fair and beauteous things, gold and silver and gems, as do all the Eldar but the Noldoli most of all; nor was the king of other mind in this, and his riches were small, save it be for that glorious Silmaril that many a king had given all his treasury contained if he might possess it.

Therefore did Tinwelint answer: âNow shalt thou have aid, O Mavwin most steadfast, and, openly I say it to thee, it is not for hope of freeing TÃ³rin thereby that I grant it to thee, for such hope I do not see in this tale, but rather the death of hope. Yet it is a truth that I have need and desire of treasury, and it may be that such shall come to me by this venture; yet half of the spoil shalt thou have O Mavwin for the memory of Ãrin and TÃ³rin, or else shalt thou ward it for NienÃ³ri thy daughter.â Then said Mavwin: âNay, give me but a woodmanâs cot and my son,â and the king answered: âThat I cannot, for I am but a king of the wild Elves, and no Vala of the western isles.â

Then Tinwelint gathered a picked band of his warriors and hunters and told them his bidding, and it seemed that the name of the FoalÃ³kÃ« was known already among them, and there were many who could guide the band unto the regions of his dwelling, yet was that name a terror to the stoutest and the places of his abode a land of accursed dread. Now the ancient dwellings of the Rodothlim were not utterly distant from the realm of Tinwelint, albeit far enough, but the king said to Mavwin: âBide now and NienÃ³ri also with me, and my men shall fare against the drake, and all that they do and find in those places will they faithfully report, and his men said: "Yea, we will do thy bidding, O King," but fear stood in their eyes.

Then Mavwin seeing it said: "Yea, O King, let Nienhri my daughter bide indeed at the feet of Gwedheling the Queen, but I who care not an I die or live will go look upon the dragon and find my son" and Tinwelint laughed, yet Gwedheling and Nienhri fearing that she spake no jest pled earnestly with her. But she was as adamant, fearing lest this her last hope of rescuing Tärin come to nought through the terror of Tinwelint's men, and none might move her. "Of love, I know," said she, "come all the words ye speak, yet give me rather a horse to ride and if ye will a sharp knife for my own death at need, and let me be gone." Now these words struck amazement into those Elves that heard, for indeed the wives and daughters of Men in those days were hardy and their youth lasted a great span, yet did this seem a madness to all.

Madder yet did it seem when Nienhri, seeing the obstinacy of her mother, said before them all: "Then I too will go; whither my mother Mavwin goeth thither more easily yet shall I, Nienhri daughter of Ärin, farewell" but Gwedheling said to the king that he allow it not, for she was a fay and perchance foresaw dimly what might be.

Then had Mavwin ended the dispute and departed from the king's presence into the woods, had not Nienhri caught at her robe and stayed her, and so did all plead with Mavwin, till at length it was agreed that the king send a strong party against the Foal-kä and that Nienhri and Mavwin ride with them until the regions of the beast be found. Then should they seek a high place whence they might see something of the deeds yet in safety and secrecy, while the warriors crept upon the worm to slay it. Now of this high place a woodsman told, and often had he gazed therefrom upon the dwelling of the worm afar. At length was that band of dragon-slayers got ready, and they were mounted upon goodly horses swift and sure-going, albeit few of those beasts were possessed by the folk of the woods. Horses too were found for Nienhri and for Mavwin, and they rode at the head of the warriors, and folk marvelled much to see their bearing, for the men of Ärin and those amongst whom Nienhri was nurtured were much upon horses, and both knave and maid among them rode even in tender years.

After many daysâ going came now that cavalcade within view of a place that once had been a fair region, and through it a swift river ran over a rocky bed, and of one side was the brink of it high and tree-grown and of the other the land was more level and fertile and broad-swelling, but beyond the high bank of the river the hills drew close. Thither as they looked they saw that the land had become all barren and was blasted for a great distance about the ancient caverns of the Rodothlim, and the trees were crushed to the earth or snapped. Toward the hills a black heath stretched and the lands were scored with the great slots that that loathly worm made in his creeping.

Many are the dragons that Melko has loosed upon the world and some are more mighty than others. Now the least mightyâyet were they very great beside the Men of those daysâare cold as is the nature of snakes and serpents, and of them a many having wings go with the uttermost noise and speed; but the mightier are hot and very heavy and slow-going, and some belch flame, and fire flickereth beneath their scales, and the lust and greed and cunning evil of these is the greatest of all creatures: and such was the FoaÃ³kÃ« whose burning there set all the places of his habitation in waste and desolation. Already greater far had this worm waxen than in the days of the onslaught upon the Rodothlim, and greater too was his hoarded treasure, for Men and Elves and even Orcs he slew, or enthralled that they served him, bringing him food to slake his lust [?on] precious things, and spoils of their harryings to swell his hoard.

Now was that band aghast as they looked upon that region from afar, yet they prepared them for battle, and drawing lots sent one of their number with NienÃ³ri and Mavwin to that high place²¹ upon the confines of the withered land that had been named, and it was covered with trees, and might be reached by hidden paths. Even as those three rode thither and the warriors crept stealthily toward the caves, leaving their horses that were already in a sweat of fear, behold the FoaÃ³kÃ« came from his lair, and sliding down the bank lay across the stream, as often was his wont. Straightway great fog and steams leapt up and a stench was mingled therein, so that that band was whelmed in vapours and well-nigh stifled, and they crying to one another in the mist displayed their presence to the worm; and he laughed aloud. At that most awful of all sounds of beasts they fled wildly in the mists, and yet they could not discover their horses, for these in an extremity of terror broke loose and fled.

Then Nien³ri hearing far cries and seeing the great mist roll toward them from the river turned back with her mother to the place of sundering, and there alighting waited in great doubt. Suddenly came that blind mist upon them as they stood, and with it came flying madly the dim horses of the huntsmen. Then their own catching their terror trampled to death that Elf who was their escort as he caught at the flying bridles, and wild with fear they sped to the dark woods and never more bore Man or Elf upon their saddles; but Mavwin and Nien³ri were left alone and succourless upon the borders of the places of fear. Very perilous indeed was their estate, and long they groped in the mist and knew not where they were nor saw they ever any of the band again, and only pale voices seemed to pass them by afar crying out as in dread, and then all was silent. Now did they cling together and being weary stumbled on heedless whither their steps might go, till on a sudden the sun gleamed thin above them, and hope returned to them; and behold the mists lifted and the airs became clearer and they stood not far from the river. Even now it smoked as it were hot, and behold the Foal³k³ lay there and his eyes were upon them.

No word did he speak nor did he move, but his baleful eye held their gaze until the strength seemed to leave their knees and their minds grew dim. Then did Nien³ri drag herself by a might of will from that influence for a while, and "Behold," she cried, "O serpent of Melko, what wilt thou with us? be swift to say or do, for know that we seek not thee nor thy gold but one T^orin who dwelt here upon a time." Then said the drake, and the earth quaked at him: "Thou liest! glad had ye been at my death, and glad thy band of cravens who now flee gibbering in the woods might they have despoiled me. Fools and liars, liars and cravens, how shall ye slay or despoil Glorund the Foal³k³, who ere his power had waxen slew the hosts of the Rodothlim and Orodreth their lord, devouring all his folk."

"Yet perchance," said Nien³ri, "one T^orin got him from that fray and dwells still here beneath thy bonds, and he has not escaped thee and is now far hence," and this she said at a venture, hoping against hope, but said the evil one: "Lo! the names of all who dwelt here before the taking of the caves of my wisdom I know, and I say to thee that none who named himself Tãrin went hence alive.â And even so was Tãrinâs boast subtly turned against him, for these beasts love ever to speak thus, doubly playing with cunning words.²² âThen was Tãrin slain in this evil place,â said Mavwin, but the dragon answered: âHere did the name of Tãrin fade for ever from the earthâbut weep not, woman, for it was the name of a craven that betrayed his friends.â âFoul beast, cease thy evil sayings,â said Mavwin; âslayer of my son, revile not the dead, lest thine own bane come upon thee.â âLess proud must be thy words, O Mavwin, an thou wilt escape torment or thy daughter with thee,â did that drake answer, but Mavwin cried: âO most accursed, lo! I fear thee not. Take me an thou wilt to thy torments and thy bondage, for of a truth I desired thy death, but suffer only NienÃ³ri my daughter to go back to the dwellings of Men: for she came hither constrained by me, and knowing not the purposes of our journey.â

âSeek not to cajole me, woman,â sneered that evil one. âLiever would I keep thy daughter and slay thee or send thee back to thy hovels, but I have need of neither of you.â With those words he opened full his evil eyes, and a light shone in them, and Mavwin and NienÃ³ri quaked beneath them and a swoon came upon their minds, and them seemed that they groped in endless tunnels of darkness, and there they found not one another ever again, and calling only vain echoes answered and there was no glimmer of light.

When however after a time that she remembered not the blackness left the mind of NienÃ³ri, behold the river and the withered places of the FoalÃ³k« were no more about her, but the deep woodlands, and it was dusk. Now she seemed to herself to awake from dreams of horror nor could she recall them, but their dread hung dark behind her mind, and her memory of all past things was dimmed. So for a long while she strayed lost in the woods, and haply the spell alone kept life in her, for she hungered bitterly and was athirst, and by fortune it was summer, for her garments became torn and her feet unshod and weary, and often she wept, and she went she knew not whither.

Now on a time in an opening in the wood she descried a campment as it were of Men, and creeping nigh by reason of hunger to espy it she saw that they were creatures of a squat and unlovely stature that dwelt there, and most evil faces had they, and their voices and their laughter was as the clash of stone and metal. Armed they were with curved swords and bows of horn, and she was possessed with fear as she looked upon them, although she knew not that they were Orcs, for never had she seen those evil ones before. Now did she turn and flee, but was espied, and one let fly a shaft at her that quivered suddenly in a tree beside her as she ran, and others seeing that it was a woman young and fair gave chase whooping and calling hideously. Now Nien³ri ran as best she might for the density of the wood, but soon was she spent and capture and dread thralldom was very near, when one came crashing through the woods as though in answer to her lamentable cries.

Wild and black was his hair yet streaked with grey, and his face was pale and marked as with deep sorrows of the past, and in his hand he bare a great sword whereof all but the very edge was black. Therewith he leapt against the following Orcs and hewed them, and they soon fled, being taken aback, and though some shot arrows at random amidst the trees they did little scathe, and five of them were slain.

Then sat Nien³ri upon a stone and for weariness and the lessened strain of fear sobs shook her and she could not speak; but her rescuer stood beside her awhile and marvelled at her fairness and that she wandered thus lonely in the woods, and at length he said: "O sweet maiden of the woods, whence comest thou, and what may be thy name?"

"Nay, these things I know not," said she. "Yet methinks I stray very far from my home and folk, and many very evil things have fallen upon me in the way, whereof nought but a cloud hangs upon my memory—nay, whence I am or whither I go I know not—and she wept afresh, but that man spake, saying: "Then behold, I will call thee N³aniel, or little one of tears," and thereat she raised her face towards his, and it was very sweet though marred with weeping, and she said with a look of wonderment: "Nay, not N³aniel, not N³aniel." Yet more might she not remember, and her face filled with distress, so that she cried: "Nay, who art thou, warrior of the woods; why troublest thou me?" "Turambar am I called," said he, "and no home nor kindred have I nor any past to think on, but I wander for ever, and again at that name that maiden's wonder stirred.

“Now,” said Turambar, “dry thy tears, O Nāniel, for thou hast come upon such safety as these woods afford. Lo, one am I now of a small folk of the forest, and a sweet dwelling in a clearing have we far from hence, but today as thy fortune would we fared a-hunting, aye, and Orc-harrying too, for we are hard put to it to fend those evil ones from our homes.”

Then did Nāniel (for thus Turambar called her ever, and she learnt to call it her name) fare away with him to his comrades, and they asking little got them upon horses, and Turambar set Nāniel before him, and thus they fared as swift as they might from the danger of the Orcs.

Now at the time of the affray of Turambar with the pursuing Orcs was half the day already spent, yet were they already leagues upon their way ere they dismounted once more, and it was then early night. Already at the sunset had it seemed to Nāniel that the woods were lighter and less gloomy and the air less evil-laden than behind. Now did they make a camp in a glade and the stars shone clear above where the tree-roof was thin, but Nāniel lay a little apart and they gave her many fells to keep her from the night chills, and thus she slept more softly than for many a night and the breezes kissed her face, but Turambar told his comrades of the meeting in the wood and they wondered who she might be or how she came wandering thither as one under a spell of blind forgetfulness.

Next day again they pressed on and so for many journeys more beside until at length weary and fain for rest they came one noon to a woodland stream, and this they followed for some way until, behold, they came to a place where it might be forded by reason of its shallowness and of the rocks that stood up in its course; but on their right it dived in a great fall and fell into a chasm, and Turambar pointing said: “Now are we nigh to home, for this is the fall of the Silver Bowl,” but Nāniel not knowing why was filled with a dread and could not look upon the loveliness of that foaming water. Now soon came they to places of thinner trees and to a slope whereon but few grew save here and there an ancient oak of great girth, and the grass about their feet was soft, for the clearing had been made many years and was very wide. There stood also a cluster of goodly houses of timber, and a tilth was about them and trees of fruit. To one of these houses that was adorned with strange rude carvings, and flowers bloomed bright about it, did Turambar lead now Nāniel. âBehold,â said he, âmy abodeâthere an thou listest thou shalt abide for now, but methinks it is a lonely hall, and there be houses of this folk beside where there are maidens and womenfolk, and there wouldst thou liever and better be.â So came it afterward that Nien³ri dwelt with the woodrangers,* and after a while entered the house of Bethos, a stout man who had fought though then but a boy in the Battle of Unnumbered Tears. Thence did he escape, but his wife was a Noldo-maiden, as the tale telleth, and very fair, and fair also were his sons and daughters save only his eldest son Tamar Lamefoot.

Now as the days passed Turambar grew to love Nāniel very greatly indeed, and all the folk beside loved her for her great loveliness and sweetness, yet was she ever half-sorrowful and often distraught of mind, as one that seeks for something mislaid that soon she must discover, so that folk said: âWould that the Valar would lift the spell that lies upon Nāniel.â Nonetheless for the most part she was happy indeed among the folk and in the house of Bethos, and each day she grew ever fairer, and Tamar Lamefoot who was held of little account loved her though in vain.

Now came days when life once more seemed to contain joy to Turambar, and the bitterness of the past grew dim and far away, and a fresh love was in his heart. Then did he think to put his fate for ever from him and live out his life there in the woodland homes with children about him, and looking upon Nāniel he desired to wed her. Then did he often press his suit with her, yet though he was a man of valiance and renown she delayed him, saying nor yea nor no, yet herself she knew not why, for it seemed to her heart that she loved him deeply, fearing for him were he away, and knowing happiness when he was nigh.

Now it was a custom of that folk to obey a chief, and he was chosen by them from their stoutest men, and that office did he hold until of his own will he laid it down again being sick or gone in years, or were he slain. And at that time Bethos was their chief; but he was slain by evil luck in a foray not long afterâfor despite his years he still rode abroadâand it fell out that a new captain must be chosen. In the end then did they name Turambar, for his lineage, in that it was known among them that he was son of Ārin, was held in esteem among those stout rebels against Melko, whereas²³ he had beside become a very mighty man in all deeds and one of wisdom great beyond his years, by reason of his far wanderings and his dealings with the Elves.

Seeing therefore the love of their new chief for Nāniel and thinking they knew that she loved him also in return, those men began to say how they would lief see their lord wed, and that it was folly to delay for no good cause; but this word came to the ears of Nāniel, and at length she consented to be the wife of Turambar, and all were fain thereat. A goodly feast was made and there was song and mirth, and Nāniel became lady of the woodland-rangers and dwelt thereafter in Turambar's house. There great was their happiness, though there lay at times a chill foreboding upon Nāniel's heart, but Turambar was in joy and said in his heart: "Twas well that I did name myself Turambar, for lo! I have overcome the doom of evil that was woven about my feet." The past he laid aside and to Nāniel he spoke not overmuch of bygone things, save of his father and mother and the sister he had not seen, but always was Nāniel troubled at such talk and he knew not why.²⁴ But of his flight from the halls of Tinwelint and the death of Beleg and of his seeking back to Hisilā³mā he said never a word, and the thought of Failivrin lay locked in his deepest heart wellnigh forgotten.

Naught ever might Nāniel tell him of her days before, and did he ask her distress was written on her face as though he troubled the surface of dark dreams, and he grieved at times thereat, but it weighed not much upon him.

Now fare the days by and Nāniel and Turambar dwell in peace, but Tamar Lamefoot wanders the woods thinking the world an ill and bitter place, and he loved Nāniel very greatly nor might he stifle his love. But behold, in those days the Foalā³kā waxed fat, and having many bands of Noldoli and of Orcs subject to him he thought to extend his dominion far and wide. Indeed in many places in those days these beasts of Melko's did in like manner, setting up kingdoms of terror of their own that flourished beneath the evil mantle of Melko's lordship. So it was that the bands of Glorund the drake harried the folk of Tinwelint very grievously, and at length there came some night even to those woods and glades that were beloved of Turambar and his folk.

Now those woodmen fled not but dealt stoutly with their foes, and the wrath of Glorund the worm was very great when tidings were brought to him of a brave folk of Men that dwelt far beyond the river and that his marauders might not subdue them. It is told indeed that despite the cunning of his evil designs he did not yet know where was the dwelling of Turambar or of Nien-ri; and of truth in those days it seemed that fortune smiled on Turambar awhile, for his people waxed and they became prosperous, and many escaped even from uttermost Hisil-m- and came unto him, and store of wealth and good things he gathered, for all his battles brought him victory and booty. Like a king and queen did Turambar and N-riel become, and there was song and mirth in those glades of their dwelling, and much happiness in their halls. And N-riel conceived.²⁵

Much of this did spies report to the Foal-k-, and his wrath was terrible. Moreover his greed was mightily kindled, so that after pondering much he set a guard that he might trust to watch his dwelling and his treasury, and the captain of these was M-m the dwarf.²⁶ Then leaving the caves and the places of his sleep he crossed the streams and drew into the woods, and they blazed before his face. Tidings of this came swiftly to Turambar, but he feared not as yet nor indeed heeded the tale much, for it was a very great way from the home of the woodmen to the caverns of the worm. But now sank N-riel's heart, and though she knew not wherefore a weight of dread and sorrow lay upon her, and seldom after the coming of that word did she smile, so that Turambar wondered and was sad.

Now draweth the Foal-k- during that time through the deep woods and a path of desolation lies behind, and yet in his creeping a very great while passes, until, behold, suddenly a party of the woodmen come upon him unawares sleeping in the woods among the broken trees. Of these several were overcome by the noxious breath of the beast and after were slain; but two making their utmost speed brought tidings to their lord that the tale aforetime had not been vain, and indeed now was the drake crept even within the confines of his realm; and so saying they fell fainting before his feet.

Now the place where the dragon lay was low-lying and a little hill there was, not far distant, islanded among the trees but itself not much wooded, whence might be espied albeit afar off much of that region now torn by the passage of the drake. A stream there was too that ran through the forest in that part between the drake and the dwellings of the woodmen, but its course ran very nigh to the dragon and it was a narrow stream with banks deep-cloven and oâerhung with trees. Wherefore Turambar purposed now to take his stoutest men to that knoll and watch if they could the dragonâs movements in secret, that perchance they might fall upon him at some disadvantage and contrive to slay him, for in this lay their best hope. This band he suffered not to be very great, and the rest at his bidding took arms and scoured about, fearing that hosts of the Orcs were come with the worm their lord. This indeed was not so, and he came alone trusting in his overwhelming power.

Now when Turambar made ready to depart then N aniel begged to ride beside him and he consented, for he loved her and it was his thought that if he fell and the drake lived then might none of that people be saved, and he would liever have N aniel by him, hoping perchance to snatch her at the least from the clutches of the worm, by death at his own or one of his liegeâs hands.

So rode forth together Turambar and N aniel, as that folk knew them, and behind were a score of good men. Now the distance to that knoll among the woods they compassed in a dayâs journey, and after them though it were against the bidding and counsel of Turambar there stole a great concourse of his folk, even women and children. The lure of a strange dread held them, and some thought to see a great fight, and others went with the rest thinking little, nor did any think to see what in the end their eyes saw; and they followed not far behind, for Turambarâs party went slowly and warily. When first then Turambar suffered her to ride beside him N aniel was blither than for long she had been, and she brightened the foreboding of those menâs hearts; but soon they came to a place not far from the foot of the knoll, and there her heart sank, and indeed a gloom fell upon all.

Yet very fair was that place, for here flowed that same stream that further down wound past the dragonâs lair in a deep bed cloven deep into the earth; and it came rushing cold from the hills beyond the woodmenâs homes, and it fell over a great fall where the water-worn rock jutted smooth and grey from amid the grass. Now this was the head of that force which the woodmen named the Silver Bowl, and aforetime Turambar and Nāniel had passed it by, faring home first from the rescuing of Nāniel. The height of that fall was very great and the waters had a loud and musical voice, splashing into a silver foam far below where they had worn a great hollow in the rocks; and this hollow was oāershadowed by trees and bushes, but the sun gleamed through upon the spray; and about the head of the fall there was an open glade and a green sward where grew a wealth of flowers, and men loved that spot.

Here did Nāniel of a sudden weep, and casting herself upon Turambar begged him tempt not fate but rather fly with her and all his folk, leading them into distant lands. But looking at her he said: âNay, Nāniel mine, nor thou nor I die this day, nor yet tomorrow, by the evil of the dragon or by the foemenâs swords,â but he knew not the fulfilment of his words; and hearing them Nāniel quelled her weeping and was very still. Having therefore rested a while here those warriors afterward climbed the hill and Nāniel fared with them. Afar off they might see from its summit a wide tract where all the trees were broken and the lands were hurt²⁷ and scorched and the earth black, yet nigh the edge of the trees that were still unharmed, and that was not far from the lip of the deep river-chasm, there arose a thin smoke of great blackness, and men said: âThere lieth the worm.â

Then were counsels of many a kind spoken upon that hill-top, and men feared to go openly against the dragon by day or by night or whether he waked or slept, and seeing their dread Turambar gave them a rede, and it was taken, and these were his words: âWell have ye said, O huntsmen of the woods, that not by day or by night shall men hope to take a dragon of Melko unawares, and behold this one hath made a waste about him, and the earth is beaten flat so that none may creep near and be hidden. Wherefore whoso hath the heart shall come with me and we will go down the rocks to the foot of the fall, and so gaining the path of the stream perchance we may come as nigh to the drake as may be. Then must we climb if we are able up under the near bank and so wait, for methinks the FoalÃ³kÃ« will rest not much longer ere he draweth on towards our dwellings. Thus must he either cross this deep stream or turn far out of his ways, for he is grown too mighty to creep along its bed. Now I think not that he will turn aside, for it is but a ditch, a narrow rut filled with trickling water, to the great Foal³k of the golden caves. If however he belie my counsel and come not on by this path, some few of you must take courage in your hearts, striving to decoy him warily back across the stream, that there we who lie hid may give him his bane stabbing from beneath, for the armour of these vile worms is of little worth upon their bellies.â

Now of that band were there but six that stood forward readily to go with Turambar, and he seeing that said that he had thought there were more than six brave men among his folk, yet after that he would not suffer any of the others to go with him, saying that better were the six without the hindrance of the fearful. Then did Turambar take farewell of Nâniel and they kissed upon the hilltop, and it was then late afternoon, but Nâniel's heart went as to stone with grief; and all that company descended to the head of Silver Bowl, and there she beheld her lord climb to the fall's bottom with his six companions. Now when he was vanished far below she spake bitterly to those who had dared not to go, and they for shame answered not but crept back unto the hill-top and gazed out towards the dragon's lair, and Nâniel sat beside the water looking before her, and she wept not but was in anguish.

None stayed beside her save Tamar alone who had fared unbidden with that company, and he had loved her since first she dwelt in Bethosâ halls, and once had thought to win her ere Turambar took her. The lameness of Tamar was with him from childhood, yet was he both wise and kindly, though held of little account among those folk, to whom strength was safety and valour the greatest pride of men. Now however did Tamar bear a sword, and many had scoffed at him for that, yet he took joy at the chance of guarding Nâniel, albeit she noticed him not.

Now is it to tell that Turambar reached the place of his design after great labour in the rocky bed of the stream, and with his men clambered with difficulty up the steep side of that ravine. Just below the lip of it they were lodged in certain overhanging trees, and not far off they might hear the great breathing of the beast, and some of his companions fell in dread.

Already had darkness come and all the night they clung there, and there was a strange flickering where the dragon lay and dread noises and a quaking if he stirred, and when dawn came Turambar saw that he had but three companions, and he cursed the others for their cravenhood, nor doth any tale tell whither those unfaithful ones fled. On this day did all come to pass as Turambar had thought, for the drake bestirring himself drew slowly to the chasm's edge and turned not aside, but sought to overcreep it and come thus at the homes of the woodmen. Now the terror of his oncoming was very great, for the earth shook, and those three feared lest the trees that upheld them should loosen their roots and fall into the rocky stream below. The leaves too of those trees that grew nigh were shrivelled in the serpent's breath, yet were they not hurt because of the shelter of the bank.

At length did the drake reach the stream-edge and the sight of his evil head and dripping jaws was utterly hideous, and these they saw clearly and were in terror lest he too espy them, for he crossed not over at the spot where Turambar had chosen to lie hid because of the narrowness here of the chasm and its lesser depth. Rather he began to heave himself now across the ravine a little below them, and so slipping from their places Turambar and his men reached as swiftly as might be the stream's bed and came beneath the belly of the worm. Here was the heat so great and so vile the stench that his men were taken with a sore dread and durst not climb the bank again. Then in his wrath Turambar would have turned his sword against them, but they fled, and so was it that alone he scaled the wall until he came close beneath the dragon's body, and he reeled by reason of the heat and of the stench and clung to a stout bush.

Then abiding until a very vital and unfended spot was within stroke, he heaved up Gurtholfin his black sword and stabbed with all his strength above his head, and that magic blade of the Rodothlim went into the vitals of the dragon even to the hilt, and the yell of his death-pain rent the woods and all that heard it were aghast.

Then did that drake writhe horribly and the huge spires of his contortions were terrible to see, and all the trees he brake that stood nigh to the place of his agony. Almost had he crossed the chasm when Gurtholfin pierced him, and now he cast himself upon its farther bank and laid all waste about him, and lashed and coiled and made a yelling and a bellowing such that the yet did he cease not to follow so swiftly as he might, and losing sight of her he bent his course towards that part of the forest nigh to the ravine where had been fought the worm's last fight, for indeed that might be perceived by the watchers on the hill. Now rose a bright moon when the night was old, and Tamar, wandering often alone far and wide from the woodmen's homes, knew those places, and came at last to the edge of that desolation that the dragon had made in his agony; but the moonlight was very bright, and staying among the bushes near the edge of that place Tamar heard and saw all that there betid.

Behold now Naniel had reached those places not long before him, and straightway did she run fearless into the open for love of her lord, and so found him lying with his withered hand in a swoon across his sword; but the beast that lay hugely stretched beside she heeded not at all, and falling beside Turambar she wept, and kissed his face, and put salve upon his hand, for such she had brought in a little box when first they sallied forth, fearing that many hurts would be gotten ere men wended home.

Yet Turambar woke not at her touch, nor stirred, and she cried aloud, thinking him now surely dead: "O Turambar, my lord, awake, for the serpent of wrath is dead and I alone am near!" But lo! at those words the drake stirred his last, and turning his baleful eyes upon her ere he shut them for ever said: "O thou Nienri daughter of Mavwin, I give thee joy that thou hast found thy brother at the last, for the search hath been weary and now is he become a very mighty fellow and a stabber of his foes unseen but Nienri sat as one stunned, and with that Glorund died, and with his death the veil of his spells fell from her, and all her memory grew crystal clear, neither did she forget any of those things that had befallen her since first she fell beneath the magic of the worm; so that her form shook with horror and anguish. Then did she start to her feet, standing wanly in the moon, and looking upon Turambar with wide eyes thus spake she aloud: "Then is thy doom spent at last. Well art thou dead, O most unhappy," but distraught with her woe suddenly she fled from that place and fared wildly away as one mad whithersoever her feet led her.

But Tamar whose heart was numbed with grief and ruth followed as he might, recking little of Turambar, for wrath at the fate of Nienri filled all his heart. Now the stream and the deep chasm lay across her path, but it so chanced that she turned aside ere she came to its banks and followed its winding course through stony and thorny places until she came once again to the glade at the head of the great roaring fall, and it was empty as the first grey light of a new day filtered through the trees.

There did she stay her feet and standing spake as to herself: âO waters of the forest whither do ye go? Wilt thou take NienÃ³ri, NienÃ³ri daughter of Ærin, child of woe? O ye white foams, would that ye might lave me cleanâbut deep, deep must be the waters that would wash my memory of this nameless curse. O bear me hence, far far away, where are the waters of the unremembering sea. O waters of the forest whither do ye go?â Then ceasing suddenly she cast herself over the fallâs brink, and perished where it foams about the rocks below; but at that moment the sun arose above the trees and light fell upon the waters, and the waters roared unheeding above the death of NienÃ³ri.

Now all this did Tamar behold, and to him the light of the new sun seemed dark, but turning from those places he went to the hill-top and there was already gathered a great concourse of folk, and among them were those three that had last deserted Turambar, and they made a story for the ears of the folk. But Tamar coming stood suddenly before them, and his face was terrible to see, so that a whisper ran among them: âHe is deadâ but others said: âWhat then has befallen the little NÃaniel?ââbut Tamar cried aloud: âHear, O my people, and say if there is a fate like unto the one I tell unto thee, or a woe so heavy. Dead is the drake, but at his side lieth also Turambar dead, even he who was first called TÃarin son of Ærin,³⁰ and that is well; aye very well,â and folk murmured, wondering at his speech, and some said that he was mad. But Tamar said: âFor know, O people, that NÃaniel the fair beloved of you all and whom I love dearer than my heart is dead, and the waters roar above her, for she has leapt oâer the falls of Silver Bowl desiring never more to see the light of day. Now endeth all that evil spell, now is the doom of the folk of Ærin terribly fulfilled, for she that ye called NÃaniel was even NienÃ³ri daughter of Ærin, and this did she know or ever she died, and this did she tell to the wild woods, and their echo came to me.â

At those words did the hearts of all who stood there break for sorrow and for dread, yet did none dare to go to the place of the anguish of that fair lady, for a sad spirit abideth there yet and none sets foot upon its sward; but a great remorse pierced the hearts of those three cravens, and creeping from the throng they went to seek their lord's body, and behold they found him stirring and alive, for when the dragon died the swoon had left him, and he slept a deep sleep of weariness, yet now was he awakening and was in pain. Even as those three stood by he spake and said "Níriel", and at that word they hid their faces for ruth and horror, and could not look upon his face, but afterward they roused him, and behold he was very fain of his victory; yet suddenly marking his hand he said: "Lo! one has been that has tended my hurt with skill—who think ye that it was?"—but they answered him not, for they guessed. Now therefore was Turambar borne weary and hurt back among his folk, and one sped before and cried that their lord lived, but men knew not if they were glad; and as he came among them many turned aside their faces to hide their hearts' perplexity and their tears, and none durst speak.

But Turambar said to those that stood nigh: "Where is Níriel, my Níriel—for I had thought to find her here in gladness—yet if she has returned rather to my halls then is it well", but those that heard could no longer restrain their weeping, and Turambar rose crying: "What new ill is this—speak, speak, my people, and torment me not!" But one said: "Níriel alas is dead my lord," but Turambar cried out bitterly against the Valar and his fate of woe, and at last another said: "Aye, she is dead, for she fell even into the depths of Silver Bowl," but Tamar who stood by muttered: "Nay, she cast herself thither." Then Turambar catching those words seized him by the arm and cried: "Speak, thou club-foot, speak, say what meaneth thy foul speech, or thou shalt lose thy tongue," for his misery was terrible to see.

Now was Tamar's heart in a great turmoil of pain for the dread things that he had seen and heard, and the long hopelessness of his love for Níriel, so did rage against Turambar kindle suddenly within him, and shaking off his touch he said: "A maid thou foundest in the wild woods and gave her a jesting name, that thou and all the folk called her Níriel, the little one of tears. Ill was that jest, Turambar, for lo! she has cast herself away blind with horror and with woe, desiring never to see thee again, and the name she named herself in death was Nien³ri daughter of ²Arin, child of woe, nor may all the waters of the Silver Bowl as they drop into the deep shed the full tale of tears oâer N³aniel.

Then Turambar with a roar took his throat and shook him, saying: âThou liestâthou evil son of Bethosâbut Tamar gasped âNay, accursed one; so spake Glorund the drake, and N³aniel hearing knew that it was true.â But Turambar said: âThen go commune in Mandos with thy Glorund,â and he slew him before the face of the people, and fared after as one mad, shouting âHe lieth, he liethâ and yet being free now of blindness and of dreams in his deep heart he knew that it was true and that now his weird was spent at last.

So did he leave the folk behind and drive heedless through the woods calling ever the name of N³aniel, till the woods rang most dismally with that word, and his going led him by circuitous ways ever to the glade of Silver Bowl, and none had dared to follow him. There shone the sun of afternoon, and lo, were all the trees grown sere although it was high summer still, and noise there was as of dying autumn in the leaves. Withered were all the flowers and the grass, and the voice of the falling water was sadder than tears for the death of the white maiden Nien³ri daughter of ²Arin that there had been. There stood Turambar spent at last, and there he drew his sword, and said: âHail, Gurtholfin, wand of death, for thou art all menâs bane and all menâs lives fain wouldst thou drink, knowing no lord or faith save the hand that wields thee if it be strong. Thee only have I nowâslay me therefore and be swift, for life is a curse, and all my days are creeping foul, and all my deeds are vile, and all I love is dead.â And Gurtholfin said: âThat will I gladly do, for blood is blood, and perchance thine is not less sweet than many a oneâs that thou hast given me ere nowâ and Turambar cast himself then upon the point of Gurtholfin, and the dark blade took his life.

But later some came timidly and bore him away and laid him in a place nigh, and raised a great mound over him, and thereafter some drew a great rock there with a smooth face, and on it were cut strange signs such as Turambar himself had taught them in dead days, bringing that knowledge from the caves of the Rodothlim, and that writing said:

Â

Turambar slayer of Glorund the Worm who also was TÃ°rin Mormakil Son of Ã°rin of the Woods

Â

and beneath that was carven the word âNÃ°nielâ (or child of tears); but she was not there, nor where the waters have laid her fair form doth any man know.â

Now thereupon did Eltas cease his speaking, and suddenly all who hearkened wept; but he said thereto: âYea, âtis an unhappy tale, for sorrow hath fared ever abroad among Men and doth so still, but in the wild days were very terrible things done and suffered; and yet hath Melko seldom devised more cruelty, nor do I know a tale that is more pitiful.â

Then after a time some questioned him concerning Mavwin and Ã°rin and after happenings, and he said: âNow of Mavwin hath no sure record been preserved like unto the tale of TÃ°rin Turambar her son, and many things are said and some of them differ from one another; but this much can I tell to ye, that after those dread deeds the woodfolk had no heart for their abiding place and departed to other valleys of the wood, and yet did a few linger sadly nigh their old homes; and once came an aged dame wandering through the woods, and she chanced upon that carven rock. To her did one of those woodmen read the meaning of the signs, and he told her all the tale as he remembered itâbut she was silent, and nor spoke nor moved. Then said he: âThy heart is heavy, for it is a tale to move all men to tears.â But she said: âAy, sad indeed is my heart, for I am Mavwin, mother of those twain,â and that man perceived that not yet had that long tale of sorrow reached its endingâbut Mavwin arose and went out into the woods crying in anguish, and for long time she haunted that spot so that the woodman and his folk fled and came never back, and none may say whether indeed it was Mavwin that came there or her dark shade that sought not back to Mandos by reason of her great unhappiness.³¹

Yet it is said that all these dread happenings Ã°rin saw by the magic of Melko, and was continually tempted by that Ainu to yield to his will, and he would not; but when the doom of his folk was utterly fulfilled then did Melko think to use Ārin in another and more subtle way, and he released him from that high and bitter place where he had sat through many years in torment of heart. But Melko went to him and spoke evilly of the Elves to him, and especially did he accuse Tinwelint³² of weakness and cravenhood. "Never can I comprehend," said he, "wherefore it is that there be still great and wise Men who trust to the friendship of the Elves, and becoming fools enough to resist my might do treble their folly in looking for sure help therein from Gnomes or Fairies. Lo, O Ārin, but for the faint heart of Tinwelint of the woodland how could my designs have come to pass, and perchance now had NienĀ³ri lived and Mavwin thy wife had wept not, being glad for the recovery of her son. Go therefore, O foolish one, and return to eat the bitter bread of almsgiving in the halls of thy fair friends."

Then did Ārin bowed with years and sorrow depart unmolested from Melko's realms and came unto the better lands, but ever as he went he pondered Melko's saying and the cunning web of woven truth and falsity clouded his heart's eye, and he was very bitter in spirit. Now therefore he gathered to him a band of wild Elves,³³ and they were waxen a fierce and lawless folk that dwelt not with their kin, who thrust them into the hills to live or die as they might. On a time therefore Ārin led them to the caves of the Rodothlim, and behold the Orcs had fled therefrom at the death of Glorund, and one only dwelt there still, an old misshapen dwarf who sat ever on the pile of gold singing black songs of enchantment to himself. But none had come nigh till then to despoil him, for the terror of the drake lived longer than he, and none had ventured thither again for dread of the very spirit of Glorund the worm.³⁴ Now therefore when those Elves approached the dwarf stood before the doors of the cave that was once the abode of Galweg, and he cried: "What will ye with me, O outlaws of the hills?" But Ārin answered: "We come to take what is not thine." Then said that dwarf, and his name was Mā³m: "O Ārin, little did I think to see thee, a lord of Men, with such a rabble. Harken now to the words of Mā³m the fatherless, and depart, touching not this gold no more than were it venomous fires. For has not Glorund lain long years upon it, and the evil of the drakes of Melko is on it, and no good can it bring to Man or Elf, but I, only I, can ward it, Mā³m the dwarf, and by many a dark spell have I bound it to myself.â Then Ārin wavered, but his men were wroth at that, so that he bid them seize it all, and Mā®m stood by and watched, and he broke forth into terrible and evil curses. Thereat did Ārin smite him, saying: âWe came but to take what was not thineânow for thy evil words we will take what is thine as well, even thy life.â

But Mā®m dying said unto Ārin: âNow Elves and Men shall rue this deed, and because of the death of Mā®m the dwarf shall death follow this gold so long as it remain on Earth, and a like fate shall every part and portion share with the whole.â And Ārin shuddered, but his folk laughed.

Now Ārin caused his followers to bear this gold to the halls of Tinwelint, and they murmured at that, but he said: âAre ye become as the drakes of Melko, that would lie and wallow in gold and seek no other joy? A sweeter life shall ye have in the court of that king of greed, an ye bear such treasury to him, than all the gold of Valinor can get you in the empty woods.â

Now his heart was bitter against Tinwelint, and he desired to have a vengeance on him, as may be seen. So great was that hoard that great though Ārinâs company might be scarce could they bear it to the caves of Tinwelint the king, and some âtis said was left behind and some was lost upon the way, and evil has followed its finders for ever.

Yet in the end that laden host came to the bridge before the doors, and being asked by the guards Ārin said: âSay to the king that Ārin the Steadfast is come bearing gifts,â and this was done. Then Ārin let bear all that magnificence before the king, but it was hidden in sacks or shut in boxes of rough wood; and Tinwelint greeted Ārin with joy and with amaze and bid him thrice welcome, and he and all his court arose in honour of that lord of Men; but Ārinâs heart was blind by reason of his tormented years and of the lies of Melko, and he said: âNay, O King, I do not desire to hear such wordsâbut say only, where is Mavwin my wife, and knowest thou what death did NienĀ³ri my daughter die?â And Tinwelint said that he knew not.

Then did Ārin fiercely tell that tale, and the king and all his folk about him hid their faces for great ruth, but Ārin said: âNay,³⁵ had you such a heart as have the least of Men, never would they have been lost; but lo, I bring you now a payment in full for the troubles of your puny band that went against Glorund the drake, and deserting gave up my dear ones to his power. Gaze, O Tinwelint, sweetly on my gifts, for methinks the lustre of gold is all your heart contains.â

Then did men cast down that treasury at the kingâs feet, uncovering it so that all that court were dazzled and amazedâbut Ærinâs men understood now what was forward and were little pleased. âBehold the hoard of Glorund,â said Ærin, âbought by the death of NienÃ³ri with the blood of TÃºrin slayer of the worm. Take it, O craven king, and be glad that some Men be brave to win thee riches.â

Then were Ærinâs words more than Tinwelint could endure, and he said: âWhat meanest thou, child of Men, and wherefore upbraidest thou me?³⁶ Long did I foster thy son and forgave him the evil of his deeds, and afterward thy wife I succoured, giving way against my counsel to her wild desires. Melko it is that hates thee and not I. Yet what is it to meâand wherefore dost thou of the uncouth race of Men endure to upbraid a king of the EldaliÃ«? Lo! in Palisor my life began years uncounted before the first of Men awoke. Get thee gone, O Ærin, for Melko hath bewitched thee, and take thy riches with theeâbut he forebore to slay or to bind Ærin in spells, remembering his ancient valiance in the Eldarâs cause.

Then Ærin departed, but would not touch the gold, and stricken in years he reached HisilÃ³mÃ« and died among Men, but his words living after him bred estrangement between Elves and Men. Yet it is said that when he was dead his shade fared into the woods seeking Mavwin, and long those twain haunted the woods about the fall of Silver Bowl bewailing their children. But the Elves of KÃ´r have told, and they know, that at last Ærin and Mavwin fared to Mandos, and NienÃ³ri was not there nor TÃºrin their son. Turambar indeed had followed NienÃ³ri along the black pathways to the doors of Fui, but Fui would not open to them, neither would VefÃ¡ntur. Yet now the prayers of Ærin and Mavwin came even to ManwÃ«, and the Gods had mercy on their unhappy fate, so that those twain TÃºrin and NienÃ³ri entered into FÃ´sAlmir, the bath of flame, even as Urwendi and her maidens had done in ages past before the first rising of the Sun, and so were all their sorrows and stains washed away, and they dwelt as shining Valar among the blessed ones, and now the love of that brother and sister is very fair; but Turambar indeed shall stand beside FionwÃ« in the Great Wrack, and Melko and his drakes shall curse the sword of Mormakil.â

And so saying Eltas made an end, and none asked further.

NOTES

- 1 The passage was rejected before the change of Tintoglin to Tinwelint; see p. 69.
- 2 Above the name Egnor is written âDamrod the Gnomeâ see Commentary, pp. 139â40.
- 3 Here and immediately below the name as first written was Tinthellon; this rider must belong to the same time as the note on the MS directing that Tintoglin be changed to Ellon or Tinthellon (p. 69). See note 32.
- 4 Associated with this replacement is a note on the manuscript reading: âIf Beren be a Gnome (as now in the story of TinÃviel) the references to Beren must be altered.â In the rejected passage Egnor father of Beren âwas akin to Mavwinâ, i.e. Egnor was a Man. See notes 5 and 6, and the Commentary, p. 139.
- 5 âTÃrin son of Ãrinâ: original reading âBeren Ermabwedâ. See notes 4 and 6.
- 6 Original reading âand when also the king heard of the kinship between Mavwin and Berenâ. See notes 4 and 5.
- 7 LinwÃ« (Tinto) was the kingâs original âElvishâ name, and belongs to the same âlayerâ of names as Tintoglin (see I.115, 131). Its retention here (not changed to TinwÃ«) is clearly a simple oversight. See notes 19 and 20.
- 8 Original reading âseeing that he was a Man of great sizeâ.
- 9 With this passage cf. that in the Tale of TinÃviel p. 11, which is closely similar. That the passage in Turambar is the earlier (to be presumed in any case) is shown by the fact that that in TinÃviel is only relevant if Beren is a Gnome, not a Man (see note 4).

- 10 âdreams came to themâ: original reading âdreams the Valar sent to themâ.
- 11 âand his name was Glorundâ was added later, as were the subsequent occurrences of the name on pp. 86, 94, 98; but from the first on p. 103 onwards Glorund appears in the manuscript as first written.
- 12 âwith the aid of Flinding whose wounds were not greatâ: original reading âwith the aid of a lightly wounded manâ. All the subsequent references to Flinding in this passage were added.
- 13 Original reading âTÃ°rinâs heart was bitter, and so it was that he and that other alone returned from that battleâ.âIn the phrase âreproaching TÃ°rin that he had ever withstood his wise counselsâ âeverâ means âalwaysâ: TÃ°rin had always resisted Orodrethâs counsels.
- 14 Original reading âalthough all folk at that time held such a deed grievous and cowardlyâ.
- 15 Original reading âand to look upon NienÃ³ri againâ. This was emended to âand to look upon NienÃ³ri whom he had never seenâ. The words âsince his first daysâ were added still later.
- 16 The following passage was struck out, apparently at the time of writing:

âIndeed,â said they, âit is the report of men of travel and rangers of the hills that for many and many moons have even the farthest marches been free of them and unwonted safe, and so have many men fared out of HisilÃ³mÃ« to the Lands Beyond.â And this was the truth that during the life of Turambar as an exile from the court of Tintoglin or hidden amongst the Rothwarin Melko had troubled HisilÃ³mÃ« little and the paths thereto.

(Rothwarin was the original form throughout, replaced later by Rodothlim.) See p. 92, where the situation described in the rejected passage is referred to the earlier time (before the destruction of the Rodothlim) when Mavwin and Nien³ri left Hisil³m³«.

- 17 Original reading âtwice sevenâ. When T^orin fled from the land of Tinwelint it was exactly 12 years since he had left his motherâs house (p. 75), and Nien³ri was born before that, but just how long before is not stated.
- 18 After âa great and terrible project afootâ the original reading was âthe story of which entereth not into this taleâ. I do not know whether this means that when my father first wrote here of Melkoâs âprojectâ he did not have the destruction of the Rodothlim in mind.
- 19 âthe kingâ: original reading âLinw³«â. See note 7.
- 20 Linw³«: an oversight. See note 7.
- 21 âthat high placeâ: original reading âa hillâ.
- 22 This sentence, âAnd even so was T^orinâs boastâ|â, was added in pencil later. The reference is to T^orinâs naming himself *Turambarâ*âfrom this hour shall none name me T^orin if I liveâ, p. 86.
- 23 This sentence, from âfor his lineageâ|â to approximately this point, is very lightly struck through. On the opposite page of the MS is hastily scribbled: âMake Turambar never tell new folk of his lineage (will bury the past)âthis avoids chance (as cert.) of N³niel hearing his lineage from any.â See Commentary, p. 131.
- 24 Against this sentence there is a pencilled question-mark in the margin. See note 23 and the Commentary, p. 131.
- 25 âAnd N³niel conceivedâ was added in pencil later. See Commentary, p. 135.
- 26 âand the captain of these was M³®m the dwarfâ added afterwards in pencil. See Commentary p. 137.
- 27 The word tract may be read as track, and the word hurt (but with less probability) as burnt.
- 28 As it stands this sentence can hardly mean other than that the people thought that the men were fighting among themselves; but why should they think such a thing? More likely, my father inadvertently missed out the end of the sentence: âbetwixt the seven, Turambar and his comrades, and the dragon.â

- 29 Turambar refers to Glorundâs words to him before the caves of the Rodothlim: âO TÃ^orin Mormakil, who wast once named braveâ (p. 86).
- 30 These words, from âeven he whoâ|â, were added later in pencil. Ãrin may also be read as HÃ^orin.
- 31 From this point to the end of Eltasâ tale the original text was struck through, and is followed in the manuscript book by two brief narrative outlines, these being rejected also. The text given here (from âYet it is saidâ|â) is found on slips placed in the book. For the rejected material see the Commentary, pp. 135â7.
- 32 Throughout the final portion of the text (that written on slips, see note 31) the kingâs name was first written Tinthellon, not Tintoglin (see note 3).
- 33 âElvesâ: original reading âmenâ. The same change was made below (âNow therefore when those Elves approachedâ), and a little later âmenâ was removed in two places (âhis folk laughedâ, âÃrin caused his followers to bear the goldâ, p. 114); but several occurrences of âmenâ were retained, possibly through oversight, though âmenâ is used of Elves very frequently in the Tale of Turambar (e.g. âBeleg and Flinding both stout menâ, p. 80).
- 34 This sentence, from âBut none had come nighâ|â, was added later in pencil.
- 35 This sentence, from âThen did Ãrin fiercelyâ|â, was added later, replacing âThen said Ãrin: âYet had you such a heartâ|ââ
- 36 This sentence, from âWhat meanest thouâ|â, replaces the original reading âBegone, and take thy filth with thee.â

Changes made to names in The Tale of Turambar

Fuithlug < Fothlug < Fothlog

NienÃ³ri At the first occurrence (p. 71) my father originally wrote NyenÃ²re (Nienor). Afterwards he struck out NyenÃ²re, removed the brackets round Nienor, and added -i, giving Nienori. At subsequent occurrences the name was written both Nienor and NienÃ³ri, but Nienor was changed to NienÃ³ri later throughout the earlier part of the tale. Towards the end, and in the text written on slips that concludes it, the form is Nienor. I have given NienÃ³ri throughout.

Tinwelint < Tinthellon (p. 72, twice). See p. 69 and note 3.

Tinwelint < Tinthellon also in the concluding portion of the text, see note 32.

Tinwelint < Tintoglin throughout the tale, except as just noted (where Tinwelint < Tinthellon in passages added later); see p. 69.

Gwedheling < Gwendeling at all occurrences (Gwendeling unchanged at p. 76, but this is obviously an oversight: I read (Gwedheling in the text). In the Gnomish dictionary the form Gwendeling was changed to Gwedhiling; see p. 50.

Flinding bo-Dhuilin < Flinding go-Dhuilin This change, made at the occurrence on p. 78, was not made at p. 82, but this was clearly because the form was missed, and I read bo-Dhuilin in both cases; the same change from go- to bo- in the Tale of TinÃ²viel, see p. 51. The form Dhuilin is taken by the name when the patronymic is prefixed (cf. Duilin p. 79).

Rodothlim < Rothwarin at every occurrence.

Gurtholfin < Gortholfin at the first occurrences, but from p. 90 Gurtholfin was the form first written.

Commentary on The Tale of Turambar

Â§ 1. The primary narrative

In commenting on this long tale it is convenient to break it into short sections. In the course of this commentary I frequently refer to the long (though incomplete) prose narrative, the Narn i HÃ²n HÃ²rin, given in Unfinished Tales pp. 57ff., often in preference to the briefer account in The Silmarillion, chapter XXI; and in reference to the former I cite Narn and the page-number in Unfinished Tales.

Â

(i) The capture of Árin and TÃ°rinâs childhood in HisilÃ³mÃ° (pp. 70â2).

Â

At the outset of the tale, it would be interesting to know more of the teller, Eltas. He is a puzzling figure: he seems to be a Man (he says that âour peopleâ called Turambar Turumart âafter the fashion of the Gnomesâ) living in HisilÃ³mÃ° after the days of Turambar but before the fall of Gondolin, and he âtrod OlÃ³rÃ° MallÃ°â, the Path of Dreams. Is he then a child, one of âthe children of the fathers of the fathers of Menâ, who âfound KÃ°r and remained with the Eldar for everâ (The Cottage of Lost Play, I.19â20)?

The opening passage agrees in almost all essentials with the ultimate form of the story. Thus there go back to the beginning of the âtraditionâ (or at least to its earliest extant form) the departure of HÃ°rin to the Battle of Unnumbered Tears at the summons of the Noldor, while his wife (Mavwin = Morwen) and young son TÃ°rin remained behind; the great stand of HÃ°rinâs men, and HÃ°rinâs capture by Morgoth; the reason for HÃ°rinâs torture (Morgothâs wish to learn the whereabouts of Turgon) and the mode of it, and Morgothâs curse; the birth of Nienor shortly after the great battle.

That Men were shut in HisilÃ³mÃ° (or Hithlum, the Gnomish form, which here first appears, equated with Dor LÃ³min, p. 71) after the Battle of Unnumbered Tears is stated in The Coming of the Elves (I. 118) and in the last of the outlines for Gilfanonâs Tale (I.241); later on this was transformed into the confinement of the treacherous Easterling Men in Hithlum (The Silmarillion p. 195), and their ill-treatment of the survivors of the House of Hador became an essential element in the story of TÃ°rinâs childhood. But in the Tale of Turambar the idea is already present that âthe strange men who dwelt nigh knew not the dignity of the Lady Mavwinâ. It is not in fact clear where Árin dwelt: it is said here that after the battle âMavwin got her in tears into the land of Hithlum or Dor-lâmin where all Men must now dwell, which can only mean that she went there, on account of Melko's command, from wherever she had dwelt with Ærin before; on the other hand, a little later in the tale (p. 73), and in apparent contradiction to this, Mavwin would not accept the invitation of Tinwelint to come to Artanor partly because (it is suggested) she clung to that dwelling that Ærin had set her in ere he went to the great war.

In the later story Morwen resolved to send Tërin away from fear that he would be enslaved by the Easterlings (Narn p. 70), whereas here all that is said is that Mavwin knew not in her distress how to foster both him and his sister (which presumably reflects her poverty). This in turn reflects a further difference, namely that here Nienóri was born before Tërin's departure (but see p. 131); in the later legend he and his companions left Dor-lâmin in the autumn of the Year of Lamentation and Nienor was born early in the following year thus he had never seen her, even as an infant.

An important underlying difference is the absence in the tale of the motive that Hërin had himself visited Gondolin, a fact known to Morgoth and the reason for his being taken alive (The Silmarillion pp. 158-9, 196-7); this element in the story arose much later, when the founding of Gondolin was set far back and long before the Battle of Unnumbered Tears.

(ii) Tërin in Artanor (pp. 72-6)

From the original story of Tërin's journey the two old men who accompanied him, one of whom returned to Mavwin while the older remained with Tërin, were never lost; and the cry of Tërin as they set out reappears in the Narn (p. 73): "Morwen, Morwen, when shall I see you again?"

Beleg was present from the beginning, as was the meaning of his name: he was called Beleg for he was of great stature (see I.254, entry Haloisi velik, and the Appendix to The Silmarillion, entry beleg); and he plays the same rôle in the old story, rescuing the travellers starving in the forest and taking them to the king.

In the later versions there is no trace of the remarkable message sent by Tinwelint to Mavwin, and indeed his curiously candid explanation, that he held aloof from the Battle of Unnumbered Tears because in his wisdom he foresaw that Artanor could become a refuge if disaster befell, is hardly in keeping with his character as afterwards conceived. There were of course quite other reasons for his conduct (The Silmarillion p. 189). On the other hand, Mavwinâs motives for not herself leaving Hithlum remained unchanged (see the passage in the Narn, p. 70, where the word âalmsguestâ is an echo of the old tale); but the statement is puzzling that Mavwin might, when Nienâ³ri was grown, have put aside her pride and passed over the mountains, had they not become impassableâclearly suggesting that she never left Hithlum. Perhaps the meaning is, however, that she might have made the journey earlier (while TÃ°rin was still in Artanor) than she in fact did (when for a time the ways became easier, but TÃ°rin had gone).

The character of TÃ°rin as a boy reappears in every stroke of the description in the Narn (p. 77):

It seemed that fortune was unfriendly to him, so that often what he designed went awry, and what he desired he did not gain; neither did he win friendship easily, for he was not merry, and laughed seldom, and a shadow lay on his youth.

(It is a notable point that is added in the tale: âat no time did he give much heed to words that were spoken to himâ). And the ending of all word between TÃ°rin and his mother comes about in the same way-increased guard on the mountains (Narn p. 78).

While the story of TÃ°rin and Saeros as told in The Silmarillion, and in far more detail in the Narn, goes back in essentials to the Tale of Turambar, there are some notable differencesâthe chief being that as the story was first told TÃ°rinâs tormentor was slain outright by the thrown drinking-cup. The later complications of Saerosâ treacherous assault on TÃ°rin the following day and his chase to the death, of the trial of TÃ°rin in his absence for this deed and of the testimony of Nellas (this last only in the Narn) are entirely absent, necessarily; nor does Mablung appearâindeed it seems clear that Mablung first emerged at the end of the Tale of TinÃ°viel (see p. 59). Some details survived (as the comb which Orgof/Saeros offered tauntingly to TÃ°rin, Narn p. 80), while others were changed or neglected (as that it was the anniversary of TÃºrinâs departure from his homeâthough the figure of twelve years agrees with the later story, and that the king was present in the hall, contrast Narn p. 79). But the taunt that roused TÃºrin to murderous rage remained essentially the same, in that it touched on his mother; and the story was never changed that TÃºrin came into the hall tousled and roughly clad, and that he was mocked for this by his enemy.

Orgof is not greatly distinct from Saeros, if less developed. He was in the kingâs favour, proud, and jealous of TÃºrin; in the later story he was a Nandorin Elf while here he is an Ilkorin with some Gnomish blood (for Gnomes in Artanor see p. 65), but doubtless some peculiarity in his origin was part of the âtraditionâ. In the old story he is explicitly a fop and a fool, and he is not given the motives of hatred for TÃºrin that are ascribed to him in the Narn (p. 77).

Though far simpler in narrative, the essential element of TÃºrinâs ignorance of his pardon was present from the outset. The tale provides an explanation, not found later, of why TÃºrin did not, on leaving Artanor, return to Hithlum; cf. the Narn p. 87: âto Dor-lÃºmin he did not dare, for it was closely beset, and one man alone could not hope at that time, as he thought, to come through the passes of the Mountains of Shadow.â

TÃºrinâs prowess against the Orcs during his sojourn in Artanor is given a more central or indeed unique importance in the tale (âhe held the wrath of Melko from them for many yearsâ) especially as Beleg, his companion-in-arms in the later versions, is not here mentioned (and in this passage the power of the queen to withstand invasion of the kingdom seems again (see p. 63) less than it afterwards became).

(iii) TÃºrin and Beleg (pp. 76â81)

That part of the TÃºrin saga following on his days in Artanor/Doriath underwent a large development later (âTÃºrin among the Outlawsâ), and indeed my father never brought this part of the story to finality. In the oldest version there is a much more rapid development of the plot: Beleg joins TÃºrinâs band, and the destruction of the band and capture of TÃºrin by the Orcs follows (in terms of the narrative) almost immediately. There is no mention of outlaws but only of wild spirits, no long search for Thérin by Beleg, no capture and maltreatment of Beleg by the band, and no betrayal of the camp by a traitor (the part ultimately taken by Móm the Dwarf). Beleg indeed (as already noticed) is not said to have been Thérin's companion in the earlier time, before the slaying of Orgof, and they only take up together after Thérin's self-imposed exile.

Beleg is called a Noldo (p. 78), and if this single reference is to be given full weight (and there seems no reason not to: it is explicit in the Tale of Tinviel that there were Noldoli in Artanor, and Orgof had Gnomish blood) then it is to be observed that Beleg as originally conceived was an Elf of Kôr. He is not here marked out as a great bowman (neither his name Calthalion Strongbow nor his great how Belthronding appear); he is described at his first appearance (p. 73) as a wood-ranger, a huntsman of the secret Elves, but not as the chief of the marchwardens of the realm.

But from the capture of Thérin to the death of Beleg the old tale was scarcely changed afterwards in any really important respect, though altered in many details: such as Beleg's shooting of the wolf-sentinels silently in the darkness in the later story, and the flash of lightning that illuminated Beleg's face but the blue-shining lamps of the Noldor appear again in much later writings: one was borne by the Elves Gelmir and Arminas who guided Tuor through the Gate of the Noldor on his journey to the sea (see Unfinished Tales pp. 22, 51 note 2). In my father's painting (probably dating from 1927 or 1928) of the meeting between Beleg and Flinding in Taur-nu-Fuin (reproduced in Pictures by J. R. R. Tolkien, no. 37) Flinding's lamp is seen beside him. The plot of the old story is very precisely contrived in such details as the reason for the carrying of Thérin, still sleeping, out of the Orc-camp, and for Beleg's using his sword, rather than a knife, to cut Thérin's bonds; perhaps also in the crushing of Beleg by Thérin so that he was winded and could not speak his name before Thérin gave him his death-blow.

The story of Thérin's madness after the slaying of Beleg, the guidance of Gwindor, and the release of Thérin's tears at Eithel Ivrin, is here in embryo. Of the peculiar nature of Beleg's sword there is no suggestion.

(iv) T  rin among the Rodothlim; T  rin and Glorund (pp. 81  8)

In this passage is found (so far as written record goes, for it is to be remembered that a wholly erased text underlies the manuscript) the origin of Nargothrond, as yet unnamed. Among many remarkable features the chief is perhaps that Orodreth was there before Felagund, Lord of Caves, with whom in the later legend Nargothrond was identified, as its founder and deviser. (In The Silmarillion Orodreth was one of Finrod Felagund  s brothers (the sons of Finarfin), to whom Felagund gave the command of Minas Tirith on Tol Sirion after the making of Nargothrond (p. 120), and Orodreth became King of Nargothrond after Felagund  s death.) In the tale this cave-dwelling of exiled Noldoli is a simpler and rougher place, and (as is suggested) short-lived against the overwhelming power of Melko; but, as so often, there were many features that were never altered, even though in a crucial respect the history of Nargothrond was to be greatly modified by contact with the legend of Beren and Tin  viel. Thus the site was from the start   above a stream   (the later Narog) that   ran down to feed the river Sirion  , and as is seen later (p. 96) the bank of the river on the side of the caves was higher and the hills drew close: cf. The Silmarillion p. 114:   the caves under the High Faroth in its steep western shore  . The policy of secrecy and refusal of open war pursued by the Elves of Nargothrond was always an essential element (cf. The Silmarillion pp. 168, 170), * as was the overturning of that policy by the confidence and masterfulness of T  rin (though in the tale there is no mention of the great bridge that he caused to be built). Here, however, the fall of the redoubt is perhaps more emphatically attributed to T  rin, his coming there seen more simply as a curse, and the disaster as more inevitably proceeding from his unwisdom: at least in the fragments of this part of the Narn (pp. 155  7) T  rin  s case against Gwindor, who argued for the continuation of secrecy, is seemingly not without substance, despite the outcome. But the essential story is the same: T  rin  s policy revealed Nargothrond to Morgoth, who came against it with overwhelming strength and destroyed it.

In relation to the earliest version the roles of Flinding (Gwindor), Failivrin (Finduilas), and Orodreth were to undergo a remarkable set of transferences. In the old tale Flinding had been of the Rodothlim before his capture and imprisonment in Angband, just as afterwards Gwindor came from Nargothrond (but with a great development in his story, see The Silmarillion pp. 188, 191â2), and on his return was so changed as to be scarcely recognisable (I pass over such enduring minor features as the taking of TÃ°rin and Flinding/Gwindor prisoner on their coming to the caves). The beautiful Failivrin is already present, and her unrequited love for TÃ°rin, but the complication of her former relation with Gwindor is quite absent, and she is not the daughter of Orodreth the King but of one Galweg (who was to disappear utterly). Flinding is not shown as opposed to TÃ°rinâs policies; and in the final battle he aids TÃ°rin in bearing Orodreth out of the fight. Orodreth dies (after being carried back to the caves) reproaching TÃ°rin for what he has brought to passâs does Gwindor dying in The Silmarillion (p. 213), with the added bitterness of his relation with Finduilas. But Failivrinâs father Galweg is slain in the battle, as is Finduilasâ father Orodreth in The Silmarillion. Thus in the evolution of the legend Orodreth took over the rÃ°le of Galweg, while Gwindor took over in part the rÃ°le of Orodreth.

As I have noticed earlier, there is no mention in the tale of any peculiarity attaching to Belegâs sword, and though the Black Sword is already present it was made for TÃ°rin on the orders of Orodreth, and its blackness and its shining pale edges were of its first making (see The Silmarillion pp. 209â10). Its power of speech (âit is said that at times it spake dark words to himâ) remained afterwards in its dreadful words to TÃ°rin before his death (Narn p. 145)âa motive that appears already in the tale, p. 112; and TÃ°rinâs name derived from the sword (here Mormagli, Mormakil, later Mormegil) was already devised. But of TÃ°rinâs disguising of his true name in Nargothrond there is no suggestion: indeed it is explicitly stated that he said who he was.

Of Gelmir and Arminas and the warning they brought to Nargothrond from Ulmo (Narn pp. 159â62) the germ can perhaps be seen in the âwhispers in the stream at eveâ, which undoubtedly implies messages from Ulmo (see p. 77).

The dragon Glorund is named in the âlengthening spellâ in the Tale of TinÃ°viel (pp. 19, 46), but the actual name was only introduced in the course of the writing of the Tale of Turambar (see note 11). There is no suggestion that he had played any previous part in the history, or indeed that he was the first of his kind, the Father of Dragons, with a long record of evil already before the Sack of Nargothrond. Of great interest is the passage in which the nature of the dragons of Melko is defined: their evil wisdom, their love of lies and gold (which they may not use or enjoyâ), and the knowledge of tongues that Men say would come from eating a dragonâs heart (with evident reference to the legend in the Norse Edda of Sigurd Fafnisbane, who was enabled to understand, to his own great profit, the speech of birds when he ate the heart of the dragon Fafnir, roasting it on a spit).

The story of the sack of Nargothrond is somewhat differently treated in the old story, although the essentials were to remain of the driving away of Failivrin/Finduilas among the captives and of the powerlessness of TÃ°rin to aid her, being spellbound by the dragon. Minor differences (such as the later arrival of Glorund on the scene: in The Silmarillion TÃ°rin only came back to Nargothrond after Glaurung had entered the caves and the sack was âwell nigh achievedâ) and minor agreements (such as the denial of the plunder to the Orcs) may here be passed over; most interesting is the account of TÃ°rinâs words with the dragon. Here the whole issue of TÃ°rinâs escaping or not escaping his doom is introduced, and it is significant that he takes the name Turambar at this juncture, whereas in the later legend he takes it when he joins the Woodmen in Brethil, and less is made of it. The old version is far less powerfully and concisely expressed, and the dragonâs words are less subtle and ingeniously untrue. Here too the moral is very explicitly pointed, that TÃ°rin should not have abandoned Failivrin âin danger that he himself could seeââdoes this not suggest that, even under the dragonâs spell as he was, there was a weakness (a âblindnessâ, see p. 83) in TÃ°rin which the dragon touched? As the story is told in The Silmarillion the moral would seem uncalled for: TÃ°rin was opposed by an adversary too powerful for his mind and will.

There is here a remarkable passage in which suicide is declared a sin, depriving such a one of all hope âthat ever his spirit would be freed from the dark glooms of Mandos or stray into the pleasant paths of Valinorâ. This seems to go with the perplexing passage in the tale of The Coming of the Valar and the Building of Valinor concerning the fates of Men: see p. 60.

Finally, it is strange that in the old story the gold and treasure was carried out from the caves by the Orcs and remained there (it lay by the caves above the stream), and the dragon most uncharacteristically slept before it in the open. In The Silmarillion Glaurung gathered all the hoard and riches of Felagund and heaped them, and lay upon them in the innermost hall.

(v) Tárin's return to Hithlum (pp. 88-91)

In this passage the case is much as in previous parts of the tale: the large structure of the story was not greatly changed afterwards, but there are many important differences nonetheless.

In the Tale of Turambar it is clear that the house of Mavwin was not imagined as standing near to the hills or mountains that formed the barrier between Hithlum and the Lands Beyond: Tárin was told that never did Orcs come hither deep into the land of Hisilûm, in contrast to the Narn (p. 68), where Hârin's house stood in the south-east of Dor-lûmin, and the mountains were near; Nen Lalaith indeed came down from a spring under the shadow of Amon Dorthir, over whose shoulder there was a steep pass. The removal of Mavwin from one house to another in Hithlum, visited in turn by Tárin as he sought for her, was afterwards rejected, to the improvement of the story. Here Tárin comes back to his old home in the late summer, whereas in The Silmarillion the fall of Nargothrond took place in the late autumn (the leaves fell from the trees in a great wind as they went, for the autumn was passing to a dire winter, p. 213) and Tárin came to Dor-lûmin in the Fell Winter (p. 215).

The names Brodda and Airin (later spelled Aerin) remained; but Brodda is here the lord of the land, and Airin plays a more important part in the scene in the hall, dealing justice with vigour and wisdom, than she does later. It is not said here that she had been married by force, though her life with Brodda is declared to have been very evil; but of course the situation in the later narratives is far more clear-cut: the Men of Hithlum were Easterlings, Incomers hostile to the Elves and the remnant of the House of Hador, whereas in the early story no differentiation is made among them, and indeed Brodda was âa man whom Mavwin trustedâ. The motive of Broddaâs ill-treatment of Mavwin is already present, but only to the extent that he embezzled her goods after her departure; in the Narn it seems from Aerinâs words to TÃ°rin (p. 107) that the oppression of Morwen by Brodda and others was the cause of her going at last to Doriath. In the brief account in The Silmarillion (p. 215) it is not indeed made explicit that Brodda in particular deserved TÃ°rinâs hatred.

TÃ°rinâs conduct in the hall is in the tale essentially simpler: the true story has been told to him by a passer-by, he enters to exact vengeance on Brodda for thieving Mavwinâs goods, and he does so with dispatch. As told in the Narn, where TÃ°rinâs eyes are only finally opened to the deception that has been practised upon him by the words of Aerin, who is present in the hall, his rage is more passionate, crazed, and bitter, and indeed more comprehensible: and the moral observation that TÃ°rinâs deed was âviolent and unlawfulâ is not made. The story of Aerinâs judgement on these doings, made in order to save TÃ°rin, was afterwards removed; and TÃ°rinâs solitary departure was expanded, with the addition also of the firing of Broddaâs hall by Aerin (Narn p. 109).

Some details survived all the changes: in the Narn TÃ°rin still seizes Brodda by the hair, and just as in the tale his rage suddenly expired after the deed of violence (âhis wrath was grown coldâ), so in the Narn âthe fire of his rage was as ashesâ. It may be noticed here that while in the old story TÃ°rin does not rename himself so often, his tendency to do so is already present.

The story of how âTÃ°rin came among the Woodmen and delivered them from Orcs is not found in the Tale of Turambar; nor is there any mention of the Mound of Finduilas near the Crossings of Teiglin nor any account of her fate.

(vi) The return of Gumlin to Hithlum and the departure of Mavwin and NienÃ³ri, to Artanor (pp. 91â3)

In the later story the elder of TÃ°rinâs guardians (Gumlin in the tale, Grithnir in the, Narn) plays no part after his bringing TÃ°rin to Doriath: it is only said that he stayed there till he died (Narn, p. 74); and Morwen had no tidings out of Doriath before leaving her home—indeed she only learnt that Târin had left Thingolâs realm when she got there (The Silmarillion, p. 211; cf. Aerinâs words in the Narn, p. 107: “She looked to find her son there awaiting her.”) This whole section of the tale does no more than explain with what my father doubtless felt (since he afterwards rejected it almost in its entirety) to be unnecessary complication why Mavwin went to Tinwelint. I think it is clear, however, that the difference between the versions here depends on the different views of Mavwinâs (Morwenâs) condition in Hithlum. In the old story she is not suffering hardship and oppression; she trusts Brodda to the extent of entrusting not only her goods to him but even her daughter, and is said indeed to have “peace and honour among the men of those regions” the chieftains speak of the love they bear her. A motive for her departure is found in the coming of Gumlin and the news he brings of Târinâs flight from the lands of Tinwelint. In the later story, on the other hand, Broddaâs character as tyrant and oppressor is extended, and it is Morwenâs very plight at his hands that leads her to depart. (The news that came to Târin in Doriath that “Morwenâs plight was eased” (Narn, p. 77, cf. The Silmarillion p. 199) is probably a survival from the old story; nothing is said in the later narratives to explain how this came about, and ceased.) In either case her motive for leaving is coupled with the fact of the increased safety of the lands; but whereas in the later story the reason for this was the prowess of the Black Sword of Nargothrond, in the tale it was the “great and terrible project” of Melko that was afoot—the assault on the caves of the Rodothlim (see note 18).

It is curious that in this passage Airin and Brodda are introduced as if for the first time. It is perhaps significant that the part of the tale extending from the dragonâs words “Hearken to me, O son of Ärin”—on p. 87 to “fell to his knees before Tinwelint”—on p. 92 was written in a separate part of the manuscript book: possibly this replaced an earlier text in which Brodda and Airin did not appear. But many such questions arise from the earliest manuscripts, and few can now be certainly unravelled.

(vii) Mavwin and NienÄ³ri in Artanor and their meeting with Glorund (pp. 93â9)

The next essential step in the development of the plot is the learning by Mavwin/Morwen of Târin's sojourn in Nargothrond more neatly and naturally handled in The Silmarillion (p. 217) and the Narn (p. 112), where news is brought to Thingol by fugitives from the sack, in contrast to the Tale of Turambar, where Mavwin and Nienâri only learn of the destruction of the Elves of the Caves from a band of Noldoli while themselves wandering aimlessly in the forest. It is odd that these Noldoli did not name Târin by his name but only as the Mormakil: it seems that they did not know who he was, but they knew enough of his history to make his identity plain to Mavwin. As noted above, Târin declared his name and lineage to the Elves of the Caves. In the later narrative, on the other hand, Târin did conceal it in Nargothrond, calling himself Agarwaen, but all those who brought news of the fall to Doriath declared that it was known to many in Nargothrond ere the end that the Mormegil was none other than Târin son of Hârin of Dor-lâminâ.

As often, unneeded complication in the early story was afterwards cleared away: thus the elaborate argumentation needed to get Tinwelint's warriors and Mavwin and Nienâri on the road together is gone from The Silmarillion and the Narn. In the tale the ladies and the Elvish warriors all set off together with the full intention that the former shall watch developments from a high place (afterwards Amon Ethir, the Hill of Spies); in the later story Morwen simply rides off, and the party of Elves, led by Mablung, follows after her, with Nienor among them in disguise.

Particularly notable is the passage in the tale in which Mavwin holds out the great gold-hoard of the Rodothlim as a bait to Tinwelint, and Tinwelint unashamedly admits that (as a wild Elf of the woods) it is this, not any hope of aiding Târin, that moves him to send out a party. The majesty, power, and pride of Thingol rose with the development of the conception of the Grey-elves of Beleriand; as I have said earlier (p. 63) In the beginning, Tinwelint's dwelling was not a subterranean city full of marvels but a rugged cave, and here he is seen planning a foray to augment his slender wealth in precious things as far cry from the description of his vast treasury in the Narn (p. 76):

Now Thingol had in Menegroth deep armouries filled with great wealth of weapons: metal wrought like fishesâ mail and shining like water in the moon; swords and axes, shields and helms, wrought by Telchar himself or by his master Gamil Zirak the old, or by elven-wrights more skilful still. For some things he had received in gift that came out of Valinor and were wrought by Fâanor in his mastery, than whom no craftsman was greater in all the days of the world.

Great as are the differences from the later legend in the encounter with the dragon, the stinking vapours raised by his lying in the river as the cause of the miscarriage of the plan, the maddened flight of the horses, and the enspelling of Nienor so that all memory of her past was lost, are already present. Most striking perhaps of the many differences is the fact that Mavwin was present at the conversation with Glorund; and of these speeches there is no echo in the Narn (pp. 118â19), save that Nienorâs naming of Târin as the object of their quest revealed her identity to the dragon (this is explicit in the Narn, and may probably be surmised from the tale). The peculiar tone of Glaurung in the later narrative, sneering and curt, knowing and self-possessed, and unfathomably wicked, can be detected already in the words of Glorund, but as he evolved he gained immeasurably in dread by becoming more laconic.

The chief difference of structure lies in the total absence of the âMablung-elementâ from the tale, nor is there any foreshadowing of it. There is no suggestion of an exploration of the sacked dwellings in the dragonâs absence (indeed he does not, as it appears, go any distance from them); the purpose of the expedition from Artanor was expressly warlike (âa strong party against the FoaL³kââ, âthey prepared them for battleâ), since Tinwelint had hopes of laying hands on the treasure, whereas afterwards it became purely a scouting foray, for Thingol âdesired greatly to know more of the fate of Nargothrondâ (Narn p. 113).

A curious point is that though Mavwin and Nienâ³ri were to be stationed on the tree-covered âhigh placeâ that was afterward called the Hill of Spies, and where they were in fact so stationed in The Silmarillion and the Narn, it seems that in the old story they never got there, but were ensnared by Glorund where he lay in, or not far from, the river. Thus the âhigh placeâ had in the event almost no significance in the tale.

(viii) Turambar and Nâniel (pp. 99â102)

In the later legend Nienor was found by Mablung after her ensPELLing by Glaurung, and with three companions he led her back towards the borders of Doriath. The chase after Nienor by the band of Orcs (Narn p. 120) is present in the tale, but it does not have its later narrative function of leading to Nienorâs flight and loss by Mablung and the other Elves (who do not appear): rather it leads directly to her rescue by Turambar, now dwelling among the Woodmen. In the Narn (p. 122) the Woodmen of Brethil did indeed come past the spot where they found her on their return from a foray against Orcs; but the circumstances of her finding are altogether different, most especially since there is in the tale no mention of the Haudh-en-Elleth, the Mound of Finduilas.

An interesting detail concerns Nienorâs response to Turambarâs naming her Nâniel. In The Silmarillion and the Narn âshe shook her head, but said: Nânielâ in the present text she said: âNot Nâniel, not Nâniel.â One has the impression that in the old story what impressed her darkened mind was only the resemblance of Nâniel to her own forgotten name *Nien*â³*ri* (and of Turambar to *T*â⁹*rin*), whereas in the later she both denied and in some way accepted the name Nâniel.

An original element in the legend is the Woodmenâs bringing of Nâniel to a place (âSilver Bowlâ) where there was a great waterfall (afterwards Dimrost, the Rainy Stair, where the stream of Celebros âfell towards Teiglinâ): and these falls were near to the dwellings of the Woodmenâbut the place where they found Nâniel was much further off in the forest (several daysâ journey) than were the Crossings of Teiglin from Dimrost. When she came there she was filled with dread, a foreboding of what was to happen there afterwards, and this is the origin of her shuddering fit in the later narratives, from which the place was renamed Nen Girith, the Shuddering Water (see Narn p. 149, note 24).

The utter darkness imposed on *Nâniel*âs mind by the dragonâs spell is less emphasized in the tale, and there is no suggestion that she needed to relearn her very language; but it is interesting to observe the recurrence in a changed context of the simile of âone that seeks for something mislaidâ: in the Narn (p. 123) NÃniel is said to have taken great delight in the relearning of words, âas one that finds again treasures great and small that were mislaidâ.

The lame man, here called Tamar, and his vain love of NÃniel already appear; unlike his later counterpart Brandir he was not the chief of the Woodmen, but he was the son of the chief. He was also Half-elfen! Most extraordinary is the statement that the wife of Bethos the chieftain and mother of Tamar was an Elf, a woman of the Noldoli: this is mentioned in passing, as if the great significance and rarity of the union of Elf and Mortal had not yet emergedâbut in a Name-list associated with the tale of The Fall of Gondolin EÃrendel is said to be âthe only being that is half of the kindred of the EldaliÃ« and half of Menâ (p. 215).*

The initial reluctance of NÃniel to receive Turambarâs suit is given no explanation in the tale: the implication must be that some instinct, some subconscious appreciation of the truth, held her back. In The Silmarillion (p. 220) for that time she delayed in spite of her love. For Brandir foreboded he knew not what, and sought to restrain her, rather for her sake than his own or rivalry with Turambar; and he revealed to her that Turambar was TÃrin son of HÃrin, and though she knew not the name a shadow fell upon her mind.

In the final version as in the oldest, the Woodmen knew who Turambar was. My fatherâs scribbled directions for the alteration of the story cited in note 23 (âMake Turambar never tell new folk of his lineageâ) are puzzling: for since NÃniel had lost all memory of her past she would not know the names TÃrin son of HÃrin even if it were told to her that Turambar was he. It is however possible that when my father wrote this he imagined NÃnielâs lost knowledge of herself and her family as being nearer the surface of her mind, and capable of being brought back by hearing the namesâin contrast to the later story where she did not consciously recognise the name of TÃrin even when Brandir told it to her. Clearly the question-mark against the reference in the text of the tale to Turambarâs speaking to N niel about his father and mother and the sister he had not seen and N nielâs distress at his words (see note 24) depends on the same train of thought. The statement here that Turambar had never seen his sister is at variance with what is said earlier in the tale, that he did not leave Hithlum until after Nien ri s birth \(p. 71\); but my father was uncertain on this point, as is clearly seen from the succession of readings, changed back and forth between the two ideas, given in note 15.

(ix) The slaying of Glorund (pp. 103 8)

In this section I follow the narrative of the tale as far as T rin s swoon when the dying dragon opened his eyes and looked at him. Here the later story runs very close to the old, but there are many interesting differences.

In the tale Glorund is said to have had bands of both Orcs and Noldoli subject to him, but only the Orcs remained afterwards; cf. the Narn p.125:

Now the power and malice of Glaurung grew apace, and he waxed fat [cf.  the Foal  k   waxed fat ], and he gathered Orcs to him, and ruled as a dragon-King, and all the realm of Nargothrond that had been was laid under him.

The mention in the tale that Tinwelint s people were  grievously harried  by Glorund s bands suggests once again that the magic of the Queen was no very substantial protection; while the statement that  at length there came some [Orcs] nigh even to those woods and glades that were beloved of Turambar and his folk  seems at variance with Turambar s saying to N niel earlier that  we are hard put to it to fend those evil ones from our homes  (p. 100). There is no mention here of Turambar s pledge to N niel that he would go to battle only if the homes of the Woodmen were assailed (Narn pp. 125 6); and there is no figure corresponding to Dorlas of the later versions. Tamar s character, briefly described (p. 106), is in accord so far as it goes with what is later told of Brandir, but the relationship of Brandir to N niel, who called him her brother (Narn p. 124), had not emerged. The happiness and prosperity of the Woodmen under Turambarâs chieftainship is much more strongly emphasized in the tale (afterwards he was not indeed the chieftain, at least not in name); and it leads in fact to Glorundâs greed as a motive for his assault on them.

The topographical indications in this passage, important to the narrative, are readily enough accommodated to the later accounts, with one major exception: it is clear that in the old story the stream of the waterfall that fell down to the Silver Bowl was the same as that which ran through the gorge where Turambar slew Glorund:

Here flowed that same stream that further down wound past the dragonâs lair [lair = "the" place where he was lying] in a deep bed cloven deep into the earth (p. 105).

Thus Turambar and his companions, as he said, will go down the rocks to the foot of the fall, and so gaining the path of the stream perchance we may come as nigh to the drake as may be (ibid.).

In the final story, on the other hand, the falling stream (Celebros) was a tributary of Teiglin; cf. the Narn p.127:

Now the river Teiglinâ flowed down from Ered Wethrin swift as Narog, but at first between low shores, until after the Crossings, gathering power from other streams, it clove a way through the feet of the highlands upon which stood the Forest of Brethil. Thereafter it ran in deep ravines, whose great sides were like walls of rock, but pent at the bottom the waters flowed with great force and noise. And right in the path of Glaurung there lay now one of these gorges, by no means the deepest, but the narrowest, just north of the inflow of Celebros.

The pleasant place (âa green sward where grew a wealth of flowersâ) survived; cf. the Narn p. 123: âThere was a wide greensward at the head of the falls, and birches grew about it.â So also did the âSilver Bowlâ, though the name was lost: âthe stream [Celebros] went over a lip of worn stone, and fell down by many foaming steps into a rocky bowl far belowâ (Narn, ibid.; cf. the tale p. 105: âit fell over a great fall where the water-worn rock jutted smooth and grey from amid the grassâ). The âlittle hillâ or âknollâ, âislanded among the treesâ, from which Turambar and his companions looked out is not so described in the Narn, but the picture of a high place and lookout near the head of the falls remained, as may be seen from the statement in the Narn (p. 123) that from Nen Girith âthere was a wide view towards the ravines of Teiglinâ later (Narn p. 128) it is said that it was Turambarâs intention to âride to the high fall of Nen Girithâ|whence he could look far across the landsâ, It seems certain, then, that the old image never faded, and was only a little changed.

While in both old and late accounts a great concourse of the people follow Turambar to the head of the falls against his bidding, in the late his motive for commanding them not to come is explicit: they are to remain in their homes and prepare for flight. Here on the other hand Nâniel rides with Turambar to the head of Silver Bowl and says farewell to him there. But a detail of the old story survived: Turambarâs words to Nâniel âNor thou nor I die this day, nor yet tomorrow, by the evil of the dragon or by the foemenâs swordsâ are closely paralleled by his words to her in the Narn (p. 129): âNeither you nor I shall be slain by this Dragon, nor by any foe of the Northâ and in the one account Nâniel âquelled her weeping and was very stillâ, while in the other she âceased to weep and fell silentâ. The situation is generally simpler in the tale, in that the Woodmen are scarcely characterised; âTamar is not as Brandir the titular head of the people, and this motive for bitterness against âTurambar is absent, nor is there a Dorlas to insult him or a Hunthor to rebuke Dorlas. Tamar is however present with Nâniel at the same point in the story, having girded himself with a sword: âand many scoffed at him for thatâ, just as it is afterwards said of Brandir that he had seldom done so before (Narn p. 132).

âTuramhar here set out from the head of the falls with six companions, all of whom proved in the end fainthearted, whereas later he had only two, Dorlas and Hunthor, and Hunthor remained staunch, though killed by a falling stone in the gorge. But the result is the same, in that Turambar must climb the further cliff of the gorge alone. Here the dragon remained where he lay near the brink of the cliff all night, and only moved with the dawn, so that his death and the events that immediately followed it took place by daylight. But in other respects the killing of the dragon remained even in many details much as it was originally written, more especially if comparison is made with the Narn (p. 134), where there reappears the need for Turambar and his companion(s) to move from their first station in order to come up directly under the belly of the beast (this is passed over in The Silmarillion).

Two notable points in this section remain to be mentioned; both are afterthoughts pencilled into the manuscript. In the one we meet for the first time Mārim the Dwarf as the captain of Glorundâs guard over his treasure during his absenceâa strange choice for the post, one would think. On this matter see p. 137 below. In the other it is said that Nâniel conceived a child by Turambar, which, remarkably enough, is not said in the text as originally written; on this see p. 135.

(x) The deaths of TÃrin and NienÃri (pp. 108â12)

In the conclusion of the story the structure remained the same from the old tale to the Narn: the moonlight, the tending of Turambarâs burnt hand, the cry of Nâniel that stirred the dragon to his final malice, the accusation by the dragon that Turambar was a stabber of foes unseen, Turambarâs naming Tamar/Brandir âClub-footâ and sending him to consort with the dragon in death, the sudden withering of the leaves at the place of Nienorâs leap as if it were already the end of autumn, the invocation of Nienor to the waters and of Turambar to his sword, the raising of TÃrinâs mound and the inscription in âstrange signsâ upon it. Many other features could be added. But there are also many differences; here I refer only to some of the most important.

Mablung being absent from the old story, it is only Turambarâs intuition (âbeing free now of blindnessâthe blindness that Melko âwove of oldâ, p. 83)* that informs him that Tamar was telling the truth. The slaying of Glaurung and all its aftermath is in the late story compassed in the course of a single night and the morning of the next day, whereas in the tale it is spread over two nights, the intervening day, and the morning of the second.

Turambar is carried back to the people on the hill-top by the three deserters who had left him in the ravine, whereas in the late story he comes himself. (Of the slaying of Dorlas by Brandir there is no trace in the tale, and the taking of a sword by Tamar has no issue.)

Particularly interesting is the result of the changing of the place where Tãrin and Nienãri died. In the tale there is only one river, and Nãniel follows the stream up through the woods and casts herself over the falls of Silver Bowl (in the place afterwards called Nen Girith), and here too, in the glade above the falls, Turambar slew himself; in the developed story her death-leap was into the ravine of Teiglin at Cabed-en-Aras, the Deerã Leap, near the spot where Turambar lay beside Glaurung, and here Turambarã death took place also. Thus Nãnielã sense of dread when she first came to Silver Bowl with the Woodmen who rescued her (p. 101) foreboded her own death in that place, but in the changed story there is less reason for a foreknowledge of evil to come upon her there. But while the place was changed, the withering of the leaves remained, and the awe of the scene of their deaths, so that none would go to Cabed-en-Aras after, as they would not set foot on the grass above Silver Bowl.

The most remarkable feature of the earliest version of the story of Turambar and Nãniel is surely that as my father first wrote it he did not say that she had conceived a child by him (note 25); and thus there is nothing in the old story corresponding to Glaurungã words to her: âBut the worst of all his deeds thou shalt feel in thyselfâ (Narn p. 138). The fact that above all accounts for Nienorã utter horror and despair was added to the tale later.

Â

In concluding this long analysis of the Tale of Turambar proper the absence of place-names in the later part of it may be remarked. The dwelling of the Rodothlim is not named, nor the river that flowed past it; no name is given to the forest where the Woodmen dwelt, to their village, or even to the stream of such central importance at the end of the story (contrast Nargothrond, Narog, Tumhalad, Amon Ethir, Brethil, Amon Obel, Ephel Brandir, Teiglin, Celebros of the later narratives).

Â§2. The further narrative of Eltas (after the death of TÃ°rin)

My father struck out the greater part of this continuation, allowing it to stand only as far as the words âby reason of her great unhappinessâ on p. 113 (see note 31). From the brief passage that was retained it is seen that the story of Morwenâs coming to the stone on TÃ°rinâs mound goes back to the beginning, though in the later story she met HÃ°rin there (The Silmarillion, p. 229).

The rejected part continues as follows:

Yet it is said also that when the doom of his folk was utterly fulfilled then was Ãrin released by Melko, and bowed with age he fared back into the better lands. There did he gather some few to him, and they went and found the caverns of the Rothwarin [earlier form for Rodothlim, see p. 119] empty, and none guarded them, and a mighty treasury lay there still for none had found it, in that the terror of the drake lived longer than he and none had ventured thither again. But Ãrin let bear the gold even before LinwÃ« [i.e. Tinwelint], and casting it before his feet bade him bitterly to take his vile reward, naming him a craven by whose faint heart had much evil fallen to his house that might never have been; and in this began a new estrangement between Elves and Men, for LinwÃ« was wroth at Ãrinâs words and bid him begone, for said he: âLong did I foster TÃ°rin thy son and forgave him the evil of his deeds, and afterward thy wife I succoured, giving way against my counsel to her wild desires. Yet what is it to meâand wherefore dost thou, O son of the uncouth race of Men, endure to upbraid a king of the EldaliÃ«, whose life began in Palisor ages uncounted before Men were born?â And then Ãrin would have gone, but his men were not willing to leave the gold there, and a dissension arose between them and the Elves, and of this grew bitter blows, and Tintoglin [i.e. Tinwelint] might not stay them.

There then was Ãrinâs band slain in his halls, and they stained with their blood the dragonâs hoard; but Ãrin escaped and cursed that gold with a dread curse so that none might enjoy it, and he that held any part of it found evil and death to come of it. But Linwë hearing that curse caused the gold to be cast into a deep pool of the river before his doors, and not for very long did any see it again save for the Ring of Doom [emended to: the Necklace of the Dwarves], and that tale belongs not here, although therein did the evil of the worm Glorund find its last fulfilment.

(The last phrase is an addition to the text.) The remainder of this rejected narrative, concerning the final fates of Árin and Mavwin and their children, is essentially the same as in the replacement text given on p. 115 (âThen Árin departedâ|â) and need not be given.

Immediately following the rejected narrative there is a short outline headed âStory of the Nauglafring or the Necklace of the Dwarvesâ, and this also was struck through. Here there is no mention of Árin at all, but it is told that the Orcs (emended from Gongs, see I.245 note 10) who guarded the treasury of Glorund went in search of him when he did not come back to the caves, and in their absence Tintoglin (i.e. Tinwelint), learning of Glorundâs death, sent Elves to steal the hoard of the Rothwarin (i.e. Rodothlim). The Orcs returning cursed the thieves, and they cursed the gold also.

Linwë (i.e. Tinwelint) guarded the gold, and he had a great necklace made by certain Ávanimor (Nautar or Nauglath). (Ávanimor have been defined in an earlier tale as âmonsters, giants, and ogresâ, see I.75, 236; Nauglath are Dwarves, I.236). In this Necklace the Silmaril was set; but the curse of the gold was on him, and he defrauded them of part of their reward. The Nauglath plotted, and got aid of Men; Linwë was slain in a raid, and the gold carried away.

Â

There follows another rejected outline, headed âThe Necklace of the Dwarvesâ, and this combines features of the preceding outline with features of the rejected ending of Eltasâ narrative (pp. 135â6). Here Árin gathers a band of Elves and Men who are wild and fierce, and they go to the caves, which are lightly guarded because the âOrquiâ (i.e. Orcs) are abroad seeking Glorund. They carry off the treasure, and the Orcs returning curse it. Árin casts the treasure before the king and reproaches him (saying that he might have sent a greater company to the caves to secure the treasure, if not to aid Mavwin in her distress); âTintoglin would not touch it and bid Árin hold what he had won, but Árin would depart with bitter wordsâ. Árinâs men were not willing to leave it, and they sneaked back; there was an affray in the kingâs halls, and much blood was spilt on the gold. The outline concludes thus:

The Gongs sack LinwÃ«âs halls and LinwÃ« is slain and the gold is carried far away. Beren Ermabwed falls upon them at a crossing of Sirion and the treasure is cast into the water, and with it the Silmaril of FÃ«anor. The Nauglath that dwell nigh dive after the gold but only one mighty necklace of gold (and that Silmaril is on it) do they find. This becomes a mark of their king.

These two outlines are partly concerned with the story of the Nauglafring and show my father pondering that story before he wrote it; there is no need to consider these elements here. It is evident that he was in great doubt as to the further course of the story after the release of Árinâwhat happened to the dragonâs hoard? Was it guarded or unguarded, and if guarded by whom? How did it come at last into Tinwelintâs hands? Who cursed it, and at what point in the story? If it was Árin and his band that seized it, were they Men or Elves or both?

In the final text, written on slips placed in the manuscript book and given above pp. 113â16, these questions were resolved thus: Árinâs band was at first Men, then changed to Elves (see note 33); the treasure was guarded by the dwarf MÃ«m, whom Árin slew, and it was he who cursed the gold as he died; Árinâs band became a baggage-train to carry the treasure to Tinwelint in sacks and wooden boxes (and they got it to the bridge before the kingâs door in the heart of the forest without, apparently, any difficulty). In this text there is no hint of what happened to the treasure after Áromâs departure (because the Tale of the Nauglafring begins at that point).

Subsequent to the writing of the Tale of Turambar proper, my father inserted MÃ«m into the text at an earlier point in the story (see pp. 103, 118 note 26), making him the captain of the guard appointed by Glorund to watch the treasure in his absence; but whether this was written in before or after the appearance of Mä®m at the end (pp. 113â14)âwhether it represents a different idea, or is an explanation of how Mä®m came to be thereâI cannot say.

In The Silmarillion (pp. 230â2) the story is wholly changed, in that the treasure remained in Nargothrond, and HÄ°rin after the slaying of Mä®m (for a far better reason than that in the early narrative) brought nothing from it to Doriath save the Necklace of the Dwarves.

Of the astonishing feature at the end of Eltasâ narrative (pp. 115â16) of the âdeificationâ of TÄ°rin Turambar and NienÄ³ri (and the refusal of the Gods of Death to open their doors to them) it must be said that nowhere is there any explanation givenâthough in much later versions of the mythology TÄ°rin Turambar appears in the Last Battle and smites Morgoth with his black sword. The purifying bath into which TÄ°rin and NienÄ³ri entered, called FÄ°sâAlmir in the final text, was in the rejected text named Fauri; in the Tale of the Sun and Moon it has been described (I. 187), but is there given other names: TanyasalpÄ°, FaskalanÄ°men, and Faskalan.

Ä

There remains one further scrap of text to be considered. The second of the rejected outlines given above (pp. 136â7) was written in ink over a pencilled outline that was not erased, and I have been able to disinter a good deal of it from beneath the later writing. The two passages have nothing to do with each other; for some reason my father did not trouble in this case to erase earlier writing. The underlying text, so far as I can make it out, reads:

TirannÄ° and VainÄ³ni fall in with the evil magician KurÄ°ki who gives them a baneful drink. They forget their names and wander distraught in the woods. VainÄ³ni is lost. She meets Turambar who saves her from Orcs and aids in her search for her mother. They are wed and live in happiness. Turambar becomes lord of rangers of the woods and a harrier of the Orcs. He goes to seek out the FoalÄ³kÄ° which ravages his land. The treasure-heapâand flight of his band. He slays the FoalÄ³kÄ° and is wounded. VainÄ³ni succours him, but the dragon in dying tells her all, lifting the veil Kur^oki has set over them. Anguish of Turambar and Vain³ni. She flees into the woods and casts herself over a waterfall. Madness of Turambar who dwells alone. Ærin escapes from Angamandi and seeks Tirann^o. Turambar flees from him and falls upon his sword. Ærin builds a cairn and doom of Melko. Tirann^o dies of grief and Ærin reaches Hisil³m. Purification of Turambar and Vain³ni who fare shining about the world and go with the hosts of Tulkas against Melko.

Detached jottings follow this, doubtless written at the same time:

Ærin escapes. Tirann^o learns of T^orin. Both wander distraught in the wood.
T^orin leaves Linw^o for in a quarrel he slew one of Linw^o's kin (accidentally).
Introduce Failivrin element into the story?
Turambar unable to fight because of Foal³k's eyes.
Sees Failivrin depart.

This can only represent some of my father's very earliest meditations on the story of T^orin Turambar. (That it appears in the notebook at the end of the fully-written Tale may seem surprising, but he clearly used these books in a rather eccentric way.) Nien³ri is here called Vain³ni, and Mavwin Tirann^o; the spell of forgetfulness is here laid by a magician named Kur^oki, although it is the dragon who lifts the veil that the magician set over them. T^orin's two encounters with the dragon seem to have emerged from an original single one.

As I have mentioned before, the Tale of Turambar, like others of the Lost Tales, is written in ink over a wholly erased pencilled text, and the extant form of the tale is such that it could only be derived from a rougher draft preceding it; but the underlying text is so completely erased that there is no clue as to what stage it had reached in the development of the legend. It may well be that in this outline concerning Vain³ni, Tirann^o, and Kur^oki we glimpse by an odd chance a layer in the T^orin-saga older even than the erased text underlying the extant version.

Â§ Miscellaneous Matters

(i) Beren

The rejected passage given on p. 71, together with the marginal note âIf Beren be a Gnome (as now in the story of TinÃviel) the references to Beren must be alteredâ (note 4), is the basis for my assertion (p. 52) that in the earliest, now lost, form of the Tale of TinÃviel Beren was a Man. I have shown, I hope, that the extant form of the Tale of Turambar preceded the extant form of the Tale of TinÃviel (p. 69). Beren was a Man, and akin to Mavwin, when the extant Turambar was written; he became a Gnome in the extant TinÃviel; and this change was then written into Turambar. What the replacement passage on p. 72 does is to change the relation of Egnor and Beren from kinship with Ãrinâs wife to friendship with Ãrin. (A correction to the typescript version of TinÃviel, p. 45, is later: making the comradeship of Ãrin with Beren rather than with Egnor.) Two further changes to the text of Turambar consequent on the change in Beren from Man to Elf are given in notes 5 and 6.âIt is interesting to observe that in the developed genealogy of The Silmarillion, when Beren was of course again a Man, he was also again akin to Morwen: for Beren was first cousin to Morwenâs father Baragund.

In the rejected passage on p. 71 my father wrote against the name Egnor âDamrod the Gnomeâ (note 2), and in the amended passage he wrote that Ãrin had known Beren âand had rendered him a service once in respect of Damrod his sonâ. There is no clue anywhere as to what this service may have been; but in the second of the âschemesâ for The Book of Lost Tales (see I.233â4) the outline for the Tale of the Nauglafring refers to the son of Beren and TinÃviel, the father of Elwing, by the name Daimord, although in the actual tale as written the son is as he was to remain Dior. Presumably Daimord is to be equated with Damrod. I cannot explain the insertion of âDamrod the Gnomeâ against âEgnorâ in the rejected passageâpossibly it was no more than a passing idea, to give the name Damrod to Berenâs father.

It may be noticed here that both the rejected and the replacement passages make it very clear that the events of the story of Beren and TinÃviel took place before the Battle of Unnumbered Tears; see pp. 65â6.

(ii) The Battle of Tasarinan

It is said at the beginning of the present tale (p. 70) that it tells of very ancient days of that folk [Men] before the Battle of Tasarinan when first Men entered the dark vales of Hisilâ³mâ.

On the face of it this offers an extreme contradiction, since it is said many times that Men were shut in Hisilâ³mâ at the time of the Battle of Unnumbered Tears, and the Tale of Turambar takes place must take place after that battle. The solution lies, however, in an ambiguity in the sentence just cited. My father did not mean that this was a tale of Men in ancient days of that folk before they entered Hisilâ³mâ he meant this is a tale of the ancient days when Men first entered Hisilâ³mâ along before the Battle of Tasarinan.

Tasarinan is the Land of Willows, Nan-tathren in The Silmarillion; the early word-lists or dictionaries give the Elvish form tasarin willow and the Gnomish tathrin.^{*} The Battle of Tasarinan took place long after, in the course of the great expedition from Valinor for the release of the enslaved Noldoli in the Great Lands. See pp. 219-20.

(iii) The geography of the Tale of Turambar

The passage describing the route of the Orcs who captured Tâ^orin (p. 77) seems to give further support to the idea that the mountains fencing Hisilâ³rnâ from the Lands Beyond were continuous with those above Angband (p. 62); for it is said here that the Orcs followed ever the line of dark hills toward those regions where they rise high and gloomy and their heads are shrouded in black vapours, and there are they called Angorodin or the Iron Mountains, for beneath the roots of their northernmost fastnesses lies Angband.

The site of the caves of the Rodothlim, agreeing well with what is said later of Nargothrond, has been discussed already (p. 123), as has the topography of the Silver Bowl and the ravine in which Turambar slew Glorund, in relation to the later Teiglin, Celebros, and Nen Girith (pp. 132-3). There are in addition some indications in the tale of how the caves of the Rodothlim related to Tinwelint's kingdom and to the land where the Woodmen dwelt. It is said (p. 95) that the dwellings of the Rodothlim were not utterly distant from the realm of Tinwelint, albeit far enoughâ while the Woodmen dwelt âin lands that were not utterly far from Sirion or the grassy hills of that riverâs middle courseâ (p. 91), which may be taken to agree tolerably with the situation of the Forest of Brethil. The region where they lived is said in the same passage to have been âvery far away many a journey beyond the river of the Rodothlimâ, and Glorundâs wrath was great when he heard of âa brave folk of Men that dwelt far beyond the riverâ (p. 103); this also can be accommodated quite well to the developed geographical conceptionâBrethil was indeed a good distance beyond the river (Narog) for one setting out from Nargothrond.

My strong impression is that though the geography of the west of the Great Lands may have been still fairly vague, it already had, in many important respects, the same essential structure and relations as those seen on the map accompanying The Silmarillion.

(iv) The influence of the Valar

As in the Tale of TinÃviel (see p. 68), in the Tale of Turambar also there are several references to the power of the Valar in the affairs of Men and Elves in the Great Landsâand to prayers, both of thanksgiving and request, addressed to them: thus TÃrinâs guardians âthanked the Valarâ that they accomplished the journey to Artanor (p. 72), and more remarkably, Ãrin âcalled upon the Valar of the west, being taught much concerning them by the Eldar of KÃrâthe Gnomes he had encounteredâand his words came, who shall say how, to ManwÃ« SÃlimo upon the heights of Taniquetilâ (p. 77). (Ãrin was already an âElf-friendâ, instructed by the Noldoli; cf. the replacement passage on p. 72.) Was his prayer âansweredâ? Possibly this is the meaning of the very strange expression âas the luck of the Valar had itâ (p. 79), when Flinding and Beleg found TÃrin lying near the point where they entered the Orc-camp.*

Dreams sent by the Valar came to the chieftains of the Rodothlim, though this was changed later and the reference to the Valar removed (p. 83 and note 10); the Woodmen said âWould that the Valar would lift the spell that lies upon NÃnielâ (p. 101); and TÃrin âcried out bitterly against the Valar and his fate of woeâ (p. 111).

An interesting reference to the Valar (and their power) occurs in Tinwelintâs reply (p. 95) to Mavwinâs words âGive me but a woodmanâs cot and my sonâ. The king said: âThat I cannot, for I am but a king of the wild Elves, and no Vala of the western isles.â In the small part of Gilfanonâs Tale that was actually written it is told (I.231) of the Dark Elves who remained in Palisor that they said that âtheir brethren had gone westward to the Shining Isles. There, said they, do the Gods dwell, and they called them the Great Folk of the West, and thought they dwelt on firelit islands in the sea.â

(v) TÃ°rinâs age

According to the Tale of Turambar, when TÃ°rin left Mavwin he was seven years old, and it was after he had dwelt among the woodland Elves for seven years that all tidings from his home ceased (p. 74); in the Narn the corresponding years are eight and nine, and TÃ°rin was seventeen, not fourteen, when âhis grief was renewedâ (pp. 68, 76â7). It was exactly twelve years to the day of his departure from Mavwin when he slew Orgof and fled from Artanor (p. 75), when he was nineteen; in the Narn (p. 79) it was likewise twelve years since he left Hithlum when he hunted Saeros to his death, but he was twenty.

âThe tale tells not the number of days that Turambar sojourned with the Rodothlim but these were very many, and during that time NienÃ³ri grew to the threshold of womanhoodâ (pp. 91â2). NienÃ³ri was seven years younger than TÃ°rin: she was twelve when he fled from Artanor (ibid.). He cannot then have dwelt among the Rodothlim for more than (say) five or six years; and it is said that when he was chosen chieftain of the Woodmen he possessed âwisdom great beyond his yearsâ.

Bethos, chieftain of the Woodmen before TÃ°rin, âhad fought though then but a boy in the Battle of Unnumbered Tearsâ (p. 101), but he was killed in a foray, since â*despite his years* he still rode abroadâ. But it is impossible to relate Bethosâ span (from âa boyâ at the Battle of Unnumbered Tears to his death on a foray at an age sufficiently ripe to be remarked on) to TÃ°rinâs; for the events after the destruction of the Rodothlim, culminating in TÃ°rinâs rescue of NÃ°niel after her first encounter with Glorund, cannot cover any great length of time. What is clear and certain is that in the old story T  rin died when still a very young man. According to the precise dating provided in much later writing, he was 35 years old at his death.

(vi) The stature of Elves and Men

The Elves are conceived to be of slighter build and stature than Men: so Beleg   was of great stature and girth as such was among that folk (p. 73), and T  rin   was a Man and of greater stature than they  , i.e. Beleg and Flinding (p. 80)  this sentence being an emendation from   he was a Man of great size   (note 8). See on this matter I.32, 235.

(vii) Winged Dragons

At the end of The Silmarillion (p. 252) Morgoth   loosed upon his foes the last desperate assault that he had prepared, and out of the pits of Angband there issued the winged dragons, that had not before been seen  . The suggestion is that winged dragons were a refinement of Morgoth  s original design (embodied in Glaurung, Father of Dragons who went upon his belly).

According to the Tale of Turambar (pp. 96  7), on the other hand, among Melko  s many dragons some were smaller, cold like snakes, and of these many were flying creatures; while others, the mightier, were hot and heavy, fire-dragons, and these were unwinged. As already noted (p. 125) there is no suggestion in the tale that Glorund was the first of his kind.

III

THE FALL OF GONDOLIN

At the end of Eltasâ account of Ærinâs visit to Tinwelint and of the strange fates of Ærin and Mavwin, TÃ°rin and NienÃ³ri (p. 116), the manuscript written on loose sheets in fact continues with a brief interlude in which the further course of the tale-telling is discussed in Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va.

Ã

And so saying Eltas made an end, and none asked further. But Lindo bid all thank him for his tale, and thereto he said: âNay, if you will, there is much yet to tell concerning the gold of Glorund, and how the evil of that worm found its last fulfilmentâbut behold, that is the story of the Nauglafring or the Necklace of the Dwarves and must wait a whileâand other stories of lighter and more happy things I have to tell if you would liefer listen to them.â

Then arose many voices begging Eltas to tell the tale of the Nauglafring on the morrow, but he said: âNay! For who here knows the full tale of Tuor and the coming of EÃ°rendel, or who was Beren Ermabwed, and what were his deeds, for such things is it better to know rightly first.â And all said that Beren Ermabwed they knew well, but of the coming of EÃ°rendel little enough had ever been told.

âAnd great harm is that,â said Lindo, âfor it is the greatest of the stories of the Gnomes, and even in this house is Ilfiniol son of Bronweg, who knows those deeds more truly than any that are now on Earth.â

About that time Ilfiniol the Gong-warden entered indeed, and Lindo said to him: âBehold, O Littleheart son of Bronweg, it is the desire of all that you tell us the tales of Tuor and of EÃ°rendel as soon as may be.â And Ilfiniol was fain of that, but said he: âIt is a mighty tale, and seven times shall folk fare to the Tale-fire ere it be rightly told; and so twined is it with those stories of the Nauglafring and of the Elf-march¹ that I would fain have aid in that telling of Ailios here and of Meril the Lady of the Isle, for long is it since she sought this house.â

Therefore were messengers sent on the next day to the *korin*² of high elms, and they said that Lindo and Vairâ would fain see the face of their lady among them, for they purposed to make a festival and to hold a great telling of Elfin tales, ere Eriol their guest fared awhile to Tavrobel. So was it that for three days that room heard no more tales and the folk of Vanwa Tyaliâva made great preparations, but on the fourth night Meril fared there amid her company of maidens, and full of light and mirth was that place; but after the evening meat a great host sat before TÃn a Gwedrin,³ and the maidens of Meril sang the most beautiful songs that island knew.⁴

And of those one did afterward Heorrenda turn to the language of his folk, and it is thus.⁵

Â

But when those songs had fallen into silence then said Meril, who sate in the chair of Lindo: âCome now, O Ilfiniol, begin thou the tale of tales, and tell it more fully than thou hast ever done.â

Then said Littleheart son of Bronwegâ|(Tale of Gondolin).[sic]

Â

This then is the Link between the Tale of Turambar and The Fall of Gondolin (an earlier âprefaceâ to the tale is given below). It seems that my father hesitated as to which tale was to follow Turambar (see note 4), but decided that it was time to introduce The Fall of Gondolin, which had been in existence for some time.

In this Link, Ailios (later Gilfanon) is present (âI would fain have aidâ|of Ailios hereâ) at the end of Eltasâ tale of Turambar, but at the beginning of Eltasâ tale (p. 70) it is expressly said that he was not present that night. On the proposal that Eriol should âfare awhileâ to Tavrobel (as the guest of Gilfanon) see I.175.

The fact that Eltas speaks of the tale of Beren Ermabwed as if he did not know that it had only recently been told in Mar Vanwa Tyaliâva is no doubt to be explained by that tale not having been told before the Tale-fire (see pp. 4â7).

The teller of the tale of The Fall of Gondolin, Littleheart the Gong-warden of Mar Vanwa Tyaliâva, has appeared several times in the Lost Tales, and his Elvish name(s) have many different forms (see under Changes made to names at the end of the text of the tale). In The Cottage of Lost Play he is said (I. 15) to be âancient beyond countâ, and to have âsailed in Wingilot with EÃœrendel in that last voyage wherein they sought for KÃ´râ and in the Link to The Music of the Ainur (I.46) he âhad a weather-worn face and blue eyes of great merriment, and was very slender and small, nor might one say if he were fifty or ten thousandâ. He is a Gnome, the son of Bronweg/VoronwÃ« (VoronwÃ« of The Silmarillion) (I. 48, 94).

The texts of âThe Fall of Gondolinâ

The textual history of The Fall of Gondolin, if considered in detail, is extremely complex; but though I will set it out here, as I understand it, there is no need in fact for it to complicate the reading of the tale.

In the first place, there is a very difficult manuscript contained in two school exercise-books, where the title of the tale is Tuor and the Exiles of Gondolin (which bringeth in the great tale of EÃœrendel). (This is the only title actually found in the early texts, but my father always later referred to it as The Fall of Gondolin.) This manuscript is (or rather, was) the original text of the tale, dating from 1916â17 (see I.203 and Unfinished Tales p. 4), and I will call it here for convenience Tuor A. My fatherâs treatment of it subsequently was unlike that of TinÃ²viel and Turambar (where the original text was erased and a new version written in its place); in this tale he did not set down a complete new text, but allowed a good deal of the old to stand, at least in the earlier part of it: as the revision progressed the rewriting in ink over the top of the pencilled text did become almost continuous, and though the pencil was not erased the ink effectively obliterates it. But even after the second version becomes continuous there are several places where the old narrative was not over-written but merely struck through, and remains legible. Thus, while Tuor A is on the same footing as TinÃ²viel and Turambar (and others of the Lost Tales) in that it is a later revision, a second version, my fatherâs method in Gondolin allows it to be seen that here at least the revision was by no means a complete recasting (still less a re-imagining); for if those passages in the later parts of the tale which can still be compared in the two versions shew that he was following the old fairly closely, the same is quite probably true in those places where no comparison can be made.

From Tuor A, as it was when all changes had been made to it (i.e. when it was in the form that it has now), my mother made a fair copy (Tuor B), which considering the difficulty of the original is extremely exact, with only very occasional errors of transcription. I have said in Unfinished Tales (p. 5) that this copy was made apparently in 1917, but this now seems to me improbable. * Such conceptions as the Music of the Ainur, which is referred to by later addition in Tuor A (p. 163), may of course have been in my father's mind a good while before he wrote that tale in Oxford while working on the Dictionary (I.45), but it seems more likely that the revision of Tuor A (and therefore also Tuor B copied from it after its revision) belongs to that period also.

Subsequently my father took his pencil to Tuor B, emending it fairly heavily, though mostly in the earlier part of the tale, and almost entirely for stylistic rather than narrative reasons; but these emendations, as will be seen, were not all made at the same time. Some of them are written out on separate slips, and of these several have on their reverse sides parts of an etymological discussion of certain Germanic words for the Butcherbird or Shrike, material which appears in the Oxford Dictionary in the entry Wariangle. Taken with the fact that one of the slips with this material on the reverse clearly contains a direction for the shortening of the tale when delivered orally (see note 21), it is virtually certain that a good deal of the revision of Tuor B was made before my father read it to the Essay Club of Exeter College in the spring of 1920 (see Unfinished Tales p. 5).

That not all the emendations to Tuor B were made at the same time is shown by the existence of a typescript (Tuor C), without title, which extends only so far as your hill of vigilance against the evil of Melkoâ (p. 161). This was taken from Tuor B when some changes had been made to it, but not those which I deduce to have been made before the occasion when it was read aloud. An odd feature of this text is that blanks were left for many of the names, and only some were filled in afterwards. Towards the end of it there is a good deal of independent variation from Tuor B, but it is all of a minor character and none has narrative significance. I conclude that this was a side-branch that petered out.

The textual history can then be represented thus:

Since the narrative itself underwent very little change of note in the course of this history (granted that substantial parts of the original text Tuor A are almost entirely illegible), the text that follows here is that of Tuor B in its final form, with some interesting earlier readings given in the Notes. It seems that my father did not check the fair copy Tuor B against the original, and did not in every case pick up the errors of transcription it contains; when he did, he emended them anew, according to the sense, and not by reference back to Tuor A. In a very few cases I have gone back to Tuor A where this is clearly correct (as a wall of water rose nigh to the cliff-top, p. 151, where Tuor B and the typescript Tuor C have a high to the cliff-top).

Throughout the typescript Tuor is called TÃ»r. In Tuor B the name is sometimes emended from Tuor to TÃ»r in the earlier part of the tale (it appears as TÃ»r in the latest revisions), but by no means in every case. My father apparently decided to change the name but ultimately decided against it; and I give Tuor throughout.

An interesting document accompanies the Tale: this is a substantial though incomplete list of names (with explanations) that occur in it, now in places difficult or impossible to read. The names are given in alphabetical order but go only as far as L.

Linguistic information from this list is incorporated in the Appendix on Names, but the head-note to the list may be cited here:

Here is set forth by Eriol at the teaching of Bronwegâs son Elfrith [emended from Elfriniel] or Littleheart (and he was so named for the youth and wonder of his heart) those names and words that are used in these tales from either the tongue of the Elves of KÃ´r as at that time spoken in the Lonely Isle, or from that related one of the Noldoli their kin whom they wrested from Melko.

Here first are they which appear in The Tale of Tuor and the Exiles of Gondolin, first among these those ones in the Gnome-speech.

In Tuor A appear two versions (one struck out) of a short âprefaceâ to the tale by Littleheart which does not appear in Tuor B. The second version reads:

Then said Littleheart son of Bronweg: âNow the story that I tell is of the Noldoli, who were my fatherâs folk, and belike the names will ring strange in your ears and familiar folk be called by names not before heard, for the Noldoli speak a curious tongue sweet still to my ears though not maybe to all the Eldar. Wise folk see it as close kin to Eldarissa, but it soundeth not so, and I know nought of such lore. Wherefore will I utter to you the right Eldar names where there be such, but in many cases there be none.

Know then,â said he, âthat

The earlier version (headed âLink between Tuor and tale beforeâ) begins in the same way but then diverges:

âand it is sweet to my ears still, though lest it be not so to all else of Eldar and Men here gathered I will use no more of it than I must, and that is in the names of those folk and things whereof the tale tells but for which, seeing they passed away ere ever the rest of the Eldar came from KÃ´r, the Elves have no true names. Know then,â said he, âthat Tuor

This âprefaceâ thus connects to the opening of the tale. There here appears, in the second version, the name Eldarissa for the language of the Eldar or Elves, as opposed to Noldorissa (a term found in the Name-list); on the distinction involved see I.50â1. With Littleheart's words here compare what RÃºmil said to Eriol about him (I.48):

âTongues and speeches,â they will say, âone is enough for meâ and thus said Littleheart the Gong-warden once upon a time: âGnome-speech,â said he, âis enough for meâ did not that one EÃºrendel and Tuor and Bronweg my father (that mincingly ye miscall VoronwÃ«) speak it and no other?â Yet he had to learn the Elfin in the end, or be doomed either to silence or to leave Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©vaâ|â

After these lengthy preliminaries I give the text of the Tale.

Tuor and the Exiles of Gondolin
(which bringeth in the great tale of EÃºrendel)

Then said Littleheart son of Bronweg: âKnow then that Tuor was a man who dwelt in very ancient days in that land of the North called Dor LÃ³min or the Land of Shadows, and of the Eldar the Noldoli know it best.

Now the folk whence Tuor came wandered the forests and fells and knew not and sang not of the sea; but Tuor dwelt not with them, and lived alone about that lake called Mithrim, now hunting in its woods, now making music beside its shores on his rugged harp of wood and the sinews of bears. Now many hearing of the power of his rough songs came from near and far to hearken to his harping, but Tuor left his singing and departed to lonely places. Here he learnt many strange things and got knowledge of the wandering Noldoli, who taught him much of their speech and lore; but he was not fated to dwell for ever in those woods.

Thereafter âtis said that magic and destiny led him on a day to a cavernous opening down which a hidden river flowed from Mithrim. And Tuor entered that cavern seeking to learn its secret, but the waters of Mithrim drove him forward into the heart of the rock and he might not win back into the light. And this, âtis said, was the will of Ulmo Lord of Waters at whose prompting the Noldoli had made that hidden way.

Then came the Noldoli to Tuor and guided him along dark passages amid the mountains until he came out in the light once more, and saw that the river flowed swiftly in a ravine of great depth with sides unscalable. Now Tuor desired no more to return but went ever forward, and the river led him always toward the west.⁶

The sun rose behind his back and set before his face, and where the water foamed among many boulders or fell over falls there were at times rainbows woven across the ravine, but at evening its smooth sides would glow in the setting sun, and for these reasons Tuor called it Golden Cleft or the Gully of the Rainbow Roof, which is in the speech of the Gnomes Glorfalc or Cris Ilbranteloth.

Now Tuor journeyed here for three days,⁷ drinking the waters of the secret river and feeding on its fish; and these were of gold and blue and silver and of many wondrous shapes. At length the ravine widened, and ever as it opened its sides became lower and more rough, and the bed of the river more impeded with boulders against which the waters foamed and spouted. Long times would Tuor sit and gaze at the splashing water and listen to its voice, and then he would rise and leap onward from stone to stone singing as he went; or as the stars came out in the narrow strip of heaven above the gully he would raise echoes to answer the fierce twanging of his harp.

One day after a great journey of weary going Tuor at deep evening heard a cry, and he might not decide of what creature it came. Now he said: âIt is a fay-creatureâ, now, âNay, âtis but some small beast that wailleth among the rocksâ or again it seemed to him that an unknown bird piped with a voice new to his ears and strangely sadâand because he had not heard the voice of any bird in all his wandering down Golden Cleft he was glad of the sound although it was mournful. On the next day at an hour of the morning he heard the same cry above his head, and looking up beheld three great white birds beating back up the gully on strong wing, and uttering cries like to the ones he had heard amid the dusk. Now these were the gulls, the birds of Ossâ«. ⁸

In this part of that riverway there were islets of rock amid the currents, and fallen rocks fringed with white sand at the gullyside, so that it was ill-going, and seeking a while Tuor found a spot where he might with labour scale the cliffs at last. Then came a fresh wind against his face, and he said: "This is very good and like the drinking of wine," but he knew not that he was near the confines of the Great Sea.

As he went along above the waters that ravine again drew together and the walls towered up, so that he fared on a high cliff-top, and there came a narrow neck, and this was full of noise. Then Tuor looking downward saw the greatest of marvels, for it seemed that a flood of angry water would come up the narrows and flow back against the river to its source, but that water which had come down from distant Mithrim would still press on, and a wall of water rose high to the cliff-top, and it was crowned with foam and twisted by the winds. Then the waters of Mithrim were overthrown and the incoming flood swept roaring up the channel and whelmed the rocky islets and churned the white sandâso that Tuor fled and was afraid, who did not know the ways of the sea; but the Ainur put it into his heart to climb from the gully when he did, or had he been whelmed in the incoming tide, and that was a fierce one by reason of a wind from the west. Then Tuor found himself in a rugged country bare of trees, and swept by a wind coming from the set of the sun, and all the shrubs and bushes leaned to the dawn because of that prevalence of that wind. And here for a while he wandered till he came to the black cliffs by the sea and saw the ocean and its waves for the first time, and at that hour the sun sank beyond the rim of Earth far out to sea, and he stood on the cliff-top with outspread arms, and his heart was filled with a longing very great indeed. Now some say that he was the first of Men to reach the Sea and look upon it and know the desire it brings; but I know not if they say well.

In those regions he set up his abode, dwelling in a cove sheltered by great sable rocks, whose floor was of white sand, save when the high flood partly overspread it with blue water; nor did foam or froth come there save at times of the direst tempest. There long he sojourned alone and roamed about the shore or fared over the rocks at the ebb, marvelling at the pools and the great weeds, the dripping caverns and the strange sea-fowl that he saw and came to know; but the rise and fall of the water and the voice of the waves was ever to him the greatest wonder and ever did it seem a new and unimaginable thing.

Now on the quiet waters of Mithrim over which the voice of the duck or moorhen would carry far he had fared much in a small boat with a prow fashioned like to the neck of a swan, and this he had lost on the day of his finding the hidden river. On the sea he adventured not as yet, though his heart was ever egging him with a strange longing thereto, and on quiet evenings when the sun went down beyond the edge of the sea it grew to a fierce desire.

Timber he had that came down the hidden river; a goodly wood it was, for the Noldoli hewed it in the forests of Dor LÃ³win and floated it to him of a purpose. But he built not as yet aught save a dwelling in a sheltered place of his cove, which tales among the Eldar since name Falasquil. This by slow labour he adorned with fair carvings of the beasts and trees and flowers and birds that he knew about the waters of Mithrim, and ever among them was the Swan the chief, for Tuor loved this emblem and it became the sign of himself, his kindred and folk thereafter. There he passed a very great while until the loneliness of the empty sea got into his heart, and even Tuor the solitary longed for the voice of Men. Herewith the Ainur⁹ had something to do: for Ulmo loved Tuor.

One morning while casting his eye along the shoreâand it was then the latest days of summerâTuor saw three swans flying high and strong from the northward. Now these birds he had not before seen in these regions, and he took them for a sign, and said: âLong has my heart been set on a journey far from here; lo! now at length I will follow these swans.â Behold, the swans dropped into the water of his cove and there swimming thrice about rose again and winged slowly south along the coast, and Tuor bearing his harp and spear followed them.

âTwas a great dayâs journey Tuor put behind him that day; and he came ere evening to a region where trees again appeared, and the manner of the land through which he now fared differed greatly from those shores about Falasquil. There had Tuor known mighty cliffs beset with caverns and great spoutholes, and deepwalled coves, but from the cliff-tops a rugged land and flat ran bleakly back to where a blue rim far to the east spake of distant hills. Now however did he see a long and sloping shore and stretches of sand, while the distant hills marched ever nearer to the margin of the sea, and their dark slopes were clad with pine or fir and about their feet sprang birches and ancient oaks. From the feet of the hills fresh torrents rushed down narrow chasms and so found the shores and the salt waves. Now some of these clefts Tuor might not overleap, and often was it ill-going in these places, but still he laboured on, for the swans fared ever before him, now circling suddenly, now speeding forward, but never coming to earth, and the rush of their strong-beating wings encouraged him.

âTis told that in this manner Tuor fared onward for a great number of days, and that winter marched from the north somewhat speedier than he for all his tirelessness. Nevertheless came he without scathe of beast or weather at a time of first spring to a river mouth. Now here was the land less northerly and more kindly than about the issuing of Golden Cleft, and moreover by a trend of the coast was the sea now rather to the south of him than to the west, as he could mark by the sun and stars; but he had kept his right hand always to the sea.

This river flowed down a goodly channel and on its banks were rich lands: grasses and moist meadow to the one side and tree-grown slopes of the other; its waters met the sea sluggishly and fought not as the waters of Mithrim in the north. Long tongues of land lay islanded in its course covered with reeds and bushy thicket, until further to seaward sandy spits ran out; and these were places beloved by such a multitude of birds as Tuor had nowhere yet encountered. Their piping and wailing and whistling filled the air; and here amid their white wings Tuor lost sight of the three swans, nor saw he them again.

Then did Tuor grow for a season weary of the sea, for the buffeting of his travel had been sore. Nor was this without Ulmoâs devising, and that night the Noldoli came to him and he arose from sleep. Guided by their blue lanterns he found a way beside the river border, and strode so mightily inland that when dawn filled the sky to his right hand lo! the sea and its voice were far behind him, and the wind came from before him so that its odour was not even in the air. Thus came he soon to that region that has been called Arlisgion âthe place of reedsâ, and this is in those lands that are to the south of Dor LÃ³min and separated therefrom by the Iron Mountains whose spurs run even to the sea. From those mountains came this river, and of a great clearness and marvellous chill were its waters even at this place. Now this is a river most famous in the histories of Eldar and Noldoli and in all tongues is it named Sirion. Here Tuor rested awhile until driven by desire he arose once more to journey further and further by many daysâ marches along the river borders. Full spring had not yet brought summer when he came to a region yet more lovely. Here the song of small birds shrilled about him with a music of loveliness, for there are no birds that sing like the songbirds of the Land of Willows; and to this region of wonder he had now come. Here the river wound in wide curves with low banks through a great plain of the sweetest grass and very long and green; willows of untold age were about its borders, and its wide bosom was strewn with waterlily leaves, whose flowers were not yet in the earliness of the year, but beneath the willows the green swords of the flaglilies were drawn, and sedges stood, and reeds in embattled array. Now there dwelt in these dark places a spirit of whispers, and it whispered to Tuor at dusk and he was loth to depart; and at morn for the glory of the unnumbered buttercups he was yet more loth, and he tarried.

Here saw he the first butterflies and was glad of the sight; and it is said that all butterflies and their kindred were born in the valley of the Land of Willows. Then came the summer and the time of moths and the warm evenings, and Tuor wondered at the multitude of flies, at their buzzing and the droning of the beetles and the hum of bees; and to all these things he gave names of his own, and wove the names into new songs on his old harp; and these songs were softer than his singing of old.

Then Ulmo grew in dread lest Tuor dwell for ever here and the great things of his design come not to fulfilment. Therefore he feared longer to trust Tuorâs guidance to the Noldoli alone, who did service to him in secret, and out of fear of Melko wavered much. Nor were they strong against the magic of that place of willows, for very great was its enchantment. Did not even after the days of Tuor Noldorin and his Eldar come there seeking for Dor LÃ³min and the hidden river and the caverns of the Gnomesâ imprisonment; yet thus nigh to their questâs end were like to abandon it? Indeed sleeping and dancing here, and making fair music of river sounds and the murmur of grass, and weaving rich fabrics of gossamer and the feathers of winged insects, they were whelmed by the goblins sped by Melko from the Hills of Iron and Noldorin made bare escape thence. But these things were not as yet.

Behold now Ulmo leapt upon his car before the doorway of his palace below the still waters of the Outer Sea; and his car was drawn by narwhal and sealion and was in fashion like a whale; and amidst the sounding of great conches he sped from Ulmonan. So great was the speed of his going that in days, and not in years without count as might be thought, he reached the mouth of the river. Up this his car might not fare without hurt to its water and its banks; therefore Ulmo, loving all rivers and this one more than most, went thence on foot, robed to the middle in mail like the scales of blue and silver fishes; but his hair was a bluish silver and his beard to his feet was of the same hue, and he bore neither helm nor crown. Beneath his mail fell the skirts of his kirtle of shimmering greens, and of what substance these were woven is not known, but whoso looked into the depths of their subtle colours seemed to behold the faint movements of deep waters shot with the stealthy lights of phosphorescent fish that live in the abyss. Girt was he with a rope of mighty pearls, and he was shod with mighty shoes of stone.

Thither he bore too his great instrument of music; and this was of strange design, for it was made of many long twisted shells pierced with holes. Blowing therein and playing with his long fingers he made deep melodies of a magic greater than any other among musicians hath ever compassed on harp or lute, on lyre or pipe, or instruments of the bow. Then coming along the river he sate among the reeds at twilight and played upon his thing of shells; and it was nigh to those places where Tuor tarried. And Tuor hearkened and was stricken dumb. There he stood knee-deep in the grass and heard no more the hum of insects, nor the murmur of the river borders, and the odour of flowers entered not into his nostrils; but he heard the sound of waves and the wail of sea-birds, and his soul leapt for rocky places and the ledges that reek of fish, for the splash of the diving cormorant and those places where the sea bores into the black cliffs and yells aloud.

Then Ulmo arose and spake to him and for dread he came near to death, for the depth of the voice of Ulmo is of the uttermost depth: even as deep as his eyes which are the deepest of all things. And Ulmo said: âO Tuor of the lonely heart, I will not that thou dwell for ever in fair places of birds and flowers; nor would I lead thee through this pleasant land,¹⁰ but that so it must be. But fare now on thy destined journey and tarry not, for far from hence is thy weird set. Now must thou seek through the lands for the city of the folk called Gondothlim or the dwellers in stone, and the Noldoli shall escort thee thither in secret for fear of the spies of Melko. Words I will set to your mouth there, and there you shall abide awhile. Yet maybe thy life shall turn again to the mighty waters; and of a surety a child shall come of thee than whom no man shall know more of the uttermost deeps, be it of the sea or of the firmament of heaven.â Then spake Ulmo also to Tuor some of his design and desire, but thereof Tuor understood little at that time and feared greatly.

Then Ulmo was wrapped in a mist as it were of sea air in those inland places, and Tuor, with that music in his ears, would fain return to the regions of the Great Sea; yet remembering his bidding turned and went inland along the river, and so fared till day. Yet he that has heard the conches of Ulmo hears them call him till death, and so did Tuor find.

When day came he was weary and slept till it was nigh dusk again, and the Noldoli came to him and guided him. So fared he many days by dusk and dark and slept by day, and because of this it came afterwards that he remembered not over well the paths that he traversed in those times. Now Tuor and his guides held on untiring, and the land became one of rolling hills and the river wound about their feet, and there were many dales of exceeding pleasantness; but here the Noldoli became ill at ease. âThese,â said they, âare the confines of those regions which Melko infesteth with his Goblins, the people of hate. Far to the northâyet alas not far enough, would they were ten thousand leaguesâlie the Mountains of Iron where sits the power and terror of Melko, whose thralls we are. Indeed in this guiding of thee we do in secret from him, and did he know all our purposes the torment of the Balrogs would be ours.â

Falling then into such fear the Noldoli soon after left him and he fared alone amid the hills, and their going proved ill afterwards, for âMelko has many eyesâ, âtis said, and while Tuor fared with the Gnomes they took him twilight ways and by many secret tunnels through the hills. But now he became lost, and climbed often to the tops of knolls and hills scanning the lands about. Yet he might not see signs of any dwelling of folk, and indeed the city of the Gondothlim was not found with ease, seeing that Melko and his spies had not even yet discovered it. âTis said nonetheless that at this time those spies got wind thus that the strange foot of Man had been set in those lands, and that for that Melko doubled his craft and watchfulness.

Now when the Gnomes out of fear deserted Tuor, one Voronwâ« or Bronweg followed afar off despite his fear, when chiding availed not to enhearten the others. Now Tuor had fallen into a great weariness and was sitting beside the rushing stream, and the sea-longing was about his heart, and he was minded once more to follow this river back to the wide waters and the roaring waves. But this Voronwâ« the faithful came up with him again, and standing by his ear said: âO Tuor, think not but that thou shalt again one day see thy desire; arise now, and behold, I will not leave thee. I am not of the road-learned of the Noldoli, being a craftsman and maker of things made by hand of wood and of metal, and I joined not the band of escort till late. Yet of old have I heard whispers and sayings said in secret amid the weariness of thraldom, concerning a city where Noldoli might be free could they find the hidden way thereto; and we twain may without a doubt¹¹ find the road to the City of Stone, where is that freedom of the Gondothlim.â

Know then that the Gondothlim were that kin of the Noldoli who alone escaped Melkoâs power when at the Battle of Unnumbered Tears he slew and enslaved their folk¹² and wove spells about them and caused them to dwell in the Hells of Iron, faring thence at his will and bidding only.

Long time did Tuor and Bronweg¹³ seek for the city of that folk, until after many days they came upon a deep dale amid the hills. Here went the river over a very stony bed with much rush and noise, and it was curtained with a heavy growth of alders; but the walls of the dale were sheer, for they were nigh to some mountains which Voronwâ« knew not. There in the green wall that Gnome found an opening like a great door with sloping sides, and this was cloaked with thick bushes and long-tangled undergrowth; yet Voronwâ«âs piercing sight might not be deceived. Nonetheless âtis said that such a magic had its builders set about it (by aid of Ulmo whose power ran in that river even if the dread of Melko fared upon its banks) that none save of the blood of the Noldoli might light on it thus by chance; nor would Tuor have found it ever but for the steadfastness of that Gnome Voronwë.¹⁴ Now the Gondothlim made their abode thus secret out of dread of Melko; yet even so no few of the braver Noldoli would slip down the river Sirion from those mountains, and if many perished so by Melko's evil, many finding this magic passage came at last to the City of Stone and swelled its people.

Greatly did Tuor and Voronwë rejoice to find this gate, yet entering they found there a way dark, rough-going, and circuitous; and long time they travelled faltering within its tunnels. It was full of fearsome echoes, and there a countless stepping of feet would come behind them, so that Voronwë became adread, and said: "It is Melko's goblins, the Orcs of the hills." Then would they run, falling over stones in the blackness, till they perceived it was but the deceit of the place. Thus did they come, after it seemed a measureless time of fearful groping, to a place where a far light glimmered, and making for this gleam they came to a gate like that by which they had entered, but in no way overgrown. Then they passed into the sunlight and could for a while see nought, but instantly a great gong sounded and there was a clash of armour, and behold, they were surrounded by warriors in steel.

Then they looked up and could see, and lo! they were at the foot of steep hills, and these hills made a great circle wherein lay a wide plain, and set therein, not rightly at the midmost but rather nearer to that place where they stood, was a great hill with a level top, and upon that summit rose a city in the new light of the morning.

Then Voronwë spake to the Guard of the Gondothlim, and his speech they comprehended, for it was the sweet tongue of the Gnomes.¹⁵ Then spake Tuor also and questioned where they might be, and who might be the folk in arms who stood about, for he was somewhat in amaze and wondered much at the goodly fashion of their weapons. Then it was said to him by one of that company: "We are the guardians of the issue of the Way of Escape. Rejoice that ye have found it, for behold before you the City of Seven Names where all who war with Melko may find hope."

Then said Tuor: "What be those names?" And the chief of the Guard made answer: "Tis said and 'tis sung: Gondobar am I called and Gondothlimbar, City of Stone and City of the Dwellers in Stone; Gondolin the Stone of Song and Gwarestrin am I named, the Tower of Guard, Gar Thurion or the Secret Place, for I am hidden from the eyes of Melko; but they who love me most greatly call me Loth, for like a flower am I, even Lothengriol the flower that blooms on the plain." Yet, said he, "in our daily speech we speak and we name it mostly Gondolin." Then said Voronwë: "Bring us thither, for we fain would enter," and Tuor said that his heart desired much to tread the ways of that fair city.

Then said the chief of the Guard that they themselves must abide here, for there were yet many days of their moon of watch to pass, but that Voronwë and Tuor might pass on to Gondolin; and moreover that they would need thereto no guide, for "Lo, it stands fair to see and very clear, and its towers prick the heavens above the Hill of Watch in the midmost plain." Then Tuor and his companion fared over the plain that was of a marvellous level, broken but here and there by boulders round and smooth which lay amid a sward, or by pools in rocky beds. Many fair pathways lay across that plain, and they came after a day's light march to the foot of the Hill of Watch (which is in the tongue of the Noldoli Amon Gwareth). Then did they begin to ascend the winding stairways which climbed up to the city gate; nor might any one reach that city save on foot and espied from the walls. As the westward gate was golden in the last sunlight did they come to the long stair's head, and many eyes gazed¹⁶ upon them from the battlements and towers.

But Tuor looked upon the walls of stone, and the uplifted towers, upon the glistering pinnacles of the town, and he looked upon the stairs of stone and marble, bordered by slender balustrades and cooled by the leap of threadlike waterfalls seeking the plain from the fountains of Amon Gwareth, and he fared as one in some dream of the Gods, for he deemed not such things were seen by men in the visions of their sleep, so great was his amaze at the glory of Gondolin.

Even so came they to the gates, Tuor in wonder and Voronwë in great joy that daring much he had both brought Tuor hither in the will of Ulmo and had himself thrown off the yoke of Melko for ever. Though he hated him no wise less, no longer did he dread that Evil One¹⁷ with a binding terror (and of a sooth that spell which Melko held over the Noldoli was one of bottomless dread, so that he seemed ever nigh them even were they far from the Hells of Iron, and their hearts quaked and they fled not even when they could; and to this Melko trusted often).

Now is there a sally from the gates of Gondolin and a throng comes about these twain in wonder, rejoicing that yet another of the Noldoli has fled hither from Melko, and marvelling at the stature and the gaunt limbs of Tuor, his heavy spear barbed with fish bone and his great harp. Rugged was his aspect, and his locks were unkempt, and he was clad in the skins of bears. 'Tis written that in those days the fathers of the fathers of Men were of less stature than Men now are, and the children of Elfinesse of greater growth, yet was Tuor taller than any that stood there. Indeed the Gondothlim were not bent of back as some of their unhappy kin became, labouring without rest at delving and hammering for Melko, but small were they and slender and very lithe.¹⁸ They were swift of foot and surpassing fair; sweet and sad were their mouths, and their eyes had ever a joy within quivering to tears; for in those times the Gnomes were exiles at heart, haunted with a desire for their ancient home that faded not. But fate and unconquerable eagerness after knowledge had driven them into far places, and now were they hemmed by Melko and must make their abiding as fair as they might by labour and by love.

How it came ever that among Men the Noldoli have been confused with the Orcs who are Melko's goblins, I know not, unless it be that certain of the Noldoli were twisted to the evil of Melko and mingled among these Orcs, for all that race were bred by Melko of the subterranean heats and slime. Their hearts were of granite and their bodies deformed; foul their faces which smiled not, but their laugh that of the clash of metal, and to nothing were they more fain than to aid in the basest of the purposes of Melko. The greatest hatred was between them and the Noldoli, who named them Glamhoth, or folk of dreadful hate.

Behold, the armed guardians of the gate pressed back the thronging folk that gathered about the wanderers, and one among them spake saying: "This is a city of watch and ward, Gondolin on Amon Gwareth, where all may be free who are of true heart, but none may be free to enter unknown. Tell me then your names." But Voronwë¹⁹ named himself Bronweg of the Gnomes, come hither by the will of Ulmo as guide to this son of Men; and Tuor said: "I am Tuor son of Peleg son of Indor of the house of the Swan of the sons of the Men of the North who live far hence, and I fare hither by the will of Ulmo of the Outer Oceans."

Then all who listened grew silent, and his deep and rolling voice held them in amaze, for their own voices were fair as the plash of fountains. Then a saying arose among them: "Lead him before the king."

Then did the throng return within the gates and the wanderers with them, and Tuor saw they were of iron and of great height and strength. Now the streets of Gondolin were paved with stone and wide, kerbed with marble, and fair houses and courts amid gardens of bright flowers were set about the ways, and many towers of great slenderness and beauty builded of white marble and carved most marvellously rose to the heaven. Squares there were lit with fountains and the home of birds that sang amid the branches of their aged trees, but of all these the greatest was that place where stood the king's palace, and the tower thereof was the loftiest in the city, and the fountains that played before the doors shot twenty fathoms and seven in the air and fell in a singing rain of crystal: therein did the sun glitter splendidly by day, and the moon most magically shimmered by night. The birds that dwelt there were of the whiteness of snow and their voices sweeter than a lullaby of music.

On either side of the doors of the palace were two trees, one that bore blossom of gold and the other of silver, nor did they ever fade, for they were shoots of old from the glorious Trees of Valinor that lit those places before Melko and Gloomweaver withered them: and those trees the Gondothlim named Glingol and Bansil.

Then Turgon king of Gondolin robed in white with a belt of gold, and a coronet of garnets was upon his head, stood before his doors and spake from the head of the white stairs that led thereto. "Welcome, O Man of the Land of Shadows. Lo! thy coming was set in our books of wisdom, and it has been written that there would come to pass many great things in the homes of the Gondothlim whenso thou farest hither.â

Then spake Tuor, and Ulmo set power in his heart and majesty in his voice. âBehold, O father of the City of Stone, I am bidden by him who maketh deep music in the Abyss, and who knoweth the mind of Elves and Men, to say unto thee that the days of Release draw nigh. There have come to the ears of Ulmo whispers of your dwelling and your hill of vigilance against the evil of Melko, and he is glad: but his heart is wroth and the hearts of the Valar are angered who sit in the mountains of Valinor and look upon the world from the peak of Taniquetil, seeing the sorrow of the thralldom of the Noldoli and the wanderings of Men; for Melko ringeth them in the Land of Shadows beyond hills of iron. Therefore have I been brought by a secret way to bid you number your hosts and prepare for battle, for the time is ripe.â

Then spake Turgon: âThat will I not do, though it be the words of Ulmo and all the Valar. I will not adventure this my people against the terror of the Orcs, nor emperil my city against the fire of Melko.â

Then spake Tuor: âNay, if thou dost not now dare greatly then will the Orcs dwell for ever and possess in the end most of the mountains of the Earth, and cease not to trouble both Elves and Men, even though by other means the Valar contrive hereafter to release the Noldoli; but if thou trust now to the Valar, though terrible the encounter, then shall the Orcs fall, and Melko's power be minished to a little thing.â

But Turgon said that he was king of Gondolin and no will should force him against his counsel to emperil the dear labour of long ages gone; but Tuor said, for thus was he bidden by Ulmo who had feared the reluctance of Turgon: âThen am I bidden to say that men of the Gondothlim repair swiftly and secretly down the river Sirion to the sea, and there build them boats and go seek back to Valinor: lo! the paths thereto are forgotten and the highways faded from the world, and the seas and mountains are about it, yet still dwell there the Elves on the hill of KÃ´r and the Gods sit in Valinor, though their mirth is minished for sorrow and fear of Melko, and they hide their land and weave about it inaccessible magic that no evil come to its shores. Yet still might thy messengers win there and turn their hearts that they rise in wrath and smite Melko, and destroy the Hells of Iron that he has wrought beneath the Mountains of Darkness.â

Then said Turgon: âEvery year at the lifting of winter have messengers repaired swiftly and by stealth down the river that is called Sirion to the coasts of the Great Sea, and there builded them boats whereto have swans and gulls been harnessed or the strong wings of the wind, and these have sought back beyond the moon and sun to Valinor; but the paths thereto are forgotten and the highways faded from the world, and the seas and mountains are about it, and they that sit within in mirth reckon little of the dread of Melko or the sorrow of the world, but hide their land and weave about it inaccessible magic, that no tidings of evil come ever to their ears. Nay, enough of my people have for years untold gone out to the wide waters never to return, but have perished in the deep places or wander now lost in the shadows that have no paths; and at the coming of next year no more shall fare to the sea, but rather will we trust to ourselves and our city for the warding off of Melko; and thereto have the Valar been of scant help aforetime.â

Then Tuorâs heart was heavy, and Voronwã« wept; and Tuor sat by the great fountain of the king and its splashing recalled the music of the waves, and his soul was troubled by the conches of Ulmo and he would return down the waters of Sirion to the sea. But Turgon, who knew that Tuor, mortal as he was, had the favour of the Valar, marking his stout glance and the power of his voice sent to him and bade him dwell in Gondolin and be in his favour, and abide even within the royal halls if he would.

Then Tuor, for he was weary, and that place was fair, said yea; and hence cometh the abiding of Tuor in Gondolin. Of all Tuorâs deeds among the Gondothlim the tales tell not, but âtis said that many a time would he have stolen thence, growing weary of the concourses of folk, and thinking of empty forest and fell or hearing afar the sea-music of Ulmo, had not his heart been filled with love for a woman of the Gondothlim, and she was a daughter of the king.

Now Tuor learnt many things in those realms taught by Voronwã« whom he loved, and who loved him exceeding greatly in return; or else was he instructed by the skilled men of the city and the wise men of the king. Wherefore he became a man far mightier than aforetime and wisdom was in his counsel; and many things became clear to him that were unclear before, and many things known that are still unknown to mortal Men. There he heard concerning that city of Gondolin and how unstaying labour through ages of years had not sufficed to its building and adornment whereat folk²⁰ travailed yet; of the delving of that hidden tunnel he heard, which the folk named the Way of Escape, and how there had been divided counsels in that matter, yet pity for the enthralled Noldoli had prevailed in the end to its making; of the guard without ceasing he was told, that was held there in arms and likewise at certain low places in the encircling mountains, and how watchers dwelt ever vigilant on the highest peaks of that range beside builded beacons ready for the fire; for never did that folk cease to look for an onslaught of the Orcs did their stronghold become known.

Now however was the guard of the hills maintained rather by custom than necessity, for the Gondothlim had long ago with unimagined toil levelled and cleared and delved all that plain about Amon Gwareth, so that scarce Gnome or bird or beast or snake could approach but was espied from many leagues off, for among the Gondothlim were many whose eyes were keener than the very hawks of Manwë Sëlimo Lord of Gods and Elves who dwells upon Taniquetil; and for this reason did they call that vale Tumladin or the valley of smoothness. Now this great work was finished to their mind, and folk were the busier about the quarrying of metals and the forging of all manner of swords and axes, spears and bills, and the fashioning of coats of mail, byrnies and hauberks, greaves and vambraces, helms and shields. Now it was said to Tuor that already the whole folk of Gondolin shooting with bows without stay day or night might not expend their hoarded arrows in many years, and that yearly their fear of the Orcs grew the less for this.

There learnt Tuor of building with stone, of masonry and the hewing of rock and marble; crafts of weaving and spinning, brocade and painting, did he fathom, and cunning in metals. Musics most delicate he there heard; and in these were they who dwelt in the southern city the most deeply skilled, for there played a profusion of murmuring fountains and springs. Many of these subtleties Tuor mastered and learned to entwine with his songs to the wonder and heart's joy of all who heard. Strange stories of the Sun and Moon and Stars, of the manner of the Earth and its elements, and of the depths of heaven, were told to him; and the secret characters of the Elves he learnt, and their speeches and old tongues, and heard tell of Ilā̃vatar, the Lord for Always, who dwelleth beyond the world, of the great music of the Ainur about Ilā̃vatarâs feet in the uttermost deeps of time, whence came the making of the world and the manner of it, and all therein and their governance.²¹

Now for his skill and his great mastery over all lore and craft whatsoever, and his great courage of heart and body, did Tuor become a comfort and stay to the king who had no son; and he was beloved by the folk of Gondolin. Upon a time the king caused his most cunning artificers to fashion a suit of armour for Tuor as a great gift, and it was made of Gnome-steel overlaid with silver; but his helm was adorned with a device of metals and jewels like to two swan-wings, one on either side, and a swanâs wing was wrought on his shield; but he carried an axe rather than a sword, and this in the speech of the Gondothlim he named Dramborleg, for its buffet stunned and its edge clove all armour.

A house was built for him upon the southern walls, for he loved the free airs and liked not the close neighbourhood of other dwellings. There it was his delight often to stand on the battlements at dawn, and folk rejoiced to see the new light catch the wings of his helmâand many murmured and would fain have backed him into battle with the Orcs, seeing that the speeches of those two, Tuor and Turgon, before the palace were known to many; but this matter went not further for reverence of Turgon, and because at this time in Tuorâs heart the thought of the words of Ulmo seemed to have grown dim and far off.

Â

Now came days when Tuor had dwelt among the Gondothlim many years. Long had he known and cherished a love for the kingâs daughter, and now was his heart full of that love. Great love too had Idril for Tuor, and the strands of her fate were woven with his even from that day when first she gazed upon him from a high window as he stood a way-worn suppliant before the palace of the king. Little cause had Turgon to withstand their love, for he saw in Tuor a kinsman of comfort and great hope. Thus was first wed a child of Men with a daughter of Elfinesse, nor was Tuor the last. Less bliss have many had than they, and their sorrow in the end was great. Yet great was the mirth of those days when Idril and Tuor were wed before the folk in Gar Ainion, the Place of the Gods, nigh to the king's halls. A day of merriment was that wedding to the city of Gondolin, and of²² the greatest happiness to Tuor and Idril. Thereafter dwelt they in joy in that house upon the walls that looked out south over Tumladin, and this was good to the hearts of all in the city save Meglin alone. Now that Gnome was come of an ancient house, though now were its numbers less than others, but he himself was nephew to the king by his mother the king's sister Isfin; and that tale of Isfin and Eärlil may not here be told.²³

Now the sign of Meglin was a sable Mole, and he was great among quarrymen and a chief of the delvers after ore; and many of these belonged to his house. Less fair was he than most of this goodly folk, swart and of none too kindly mood, so that he won small love, and whispers there were that he had Orc's blood in his veins, but I know not how this could be true. Now he had bid often with the king for the hand of Idril, yet Turgon finding her very loth had as often said nay, for him seemed Meglin's suit was caused as much by the desire of standing in high power beside the royal throne as by love of that most fair maid. Fair indeed was she and brave thereto; and the people called her Idril of the Silver Feet* in that she went ever barefoot and bareheaded, king's daughter as she was, save only at pomps of the Ainur; and Meglin gnawed his anger seeing Tuor thrust him out.

In these days came to pass the fulfilment of the time of the desire of the Valar and the hope of [the] Eldalië, for in great love Idril bore to Tuor a son and he was called Eärendel. Now thereto there are many interpretations both among Elves and Men, but belike it was a name wrought of some secret tongue among the Gondothlim²⁴ and that has perished with them from the dwellings of the Earth.

Now this babe was of greatest beauty; his skin of a shining white and his eyes of a blue surpassing that of the sky in southern lands bluer than the sapphires of the raiment of Manwë²⁵ and the envy of Meglin was deep at his birth, but the joy of Turgon and all the people very great indeed.

Behold now many years have gone since Tuor was lost amid the foothills and deserted by those Noldoli; yet many years too have gone since to Melko's ears came first those strange tidings—faint were they and various in form—of a Man wandering amid the dales of the waters of Sirion. Now Melko was not much afraid of the race of Men in those days of his great power, and for this reason did Ulmo work through one of this kindred for the better deceiving of Melko, seeing that no Valar and scarce any of the Eldar or Noldoli might stir unmarked of his vigilance. Yet nonetheless foreboding smote that ill heart at the tidings, and he got together a mighty army of spies: sons of the Orcs were there with eyes of yellow and green like cats that could pierce all glooms and see through mist or fog or night; snakes that could go everywhither and search all crannies or the deepest pits or the highest peaks, listen to every whisper that ran in the grass or echoed in the hills; wolves there were and ravening dogs and great weasels full of the thirst of blood whose nostrils could take scent moons old through running water, or whose eyes find among shingle footsteps that had passed a lifetime since; owls came and falcons whose keen glance might descry by day or night the fluttering of small birds in all the woods of the world, and the movement of every mouse or vole or rat that crept or dwelt throughout the Earth. All these he summoned to his Hall of Iron, and they came in multitudes. Thence he sent them over the Earth to seek this Man who had escaped from the Land of Shadows, but yet far more curiously and intently to search out the dwelling of the Noldoli that had escaped his thralldom; for these his heart burnt to destroy or to enslave.

Now while Tuor dwelt in happiness and in great increase of knowledge and might in Gondolin, these creatures through the years untiring nosed among the stones and rocks, hunted the forests and the heaths, espied the airs and lofty places, tracked all paths about the dales and plains, and neither let nor stayed. From this hunt they brought a wealth of tidings to Melko—indeed among many hidden things that they dragged to light they discovered that Way of Escape whereby Tuor and Voronwë entered aforetime. Nor had they done so save by constraining some of the less stout of the Noldoli with dire threats of torment to join in that great ransacking; for because of the magic about that gate no folk of Melko unaided by the Gnomes could come to

it. Yet now they had pried of late far into its tunnels and captured within many of the Noldoli creeping there to flee from thralldom. They had scaled too the Encircling Hills* at certain places and gazed upon the beauty of the city of Gondolin and the strength of Amon Gwareth from afar; but into the plain they could not win for the vigilance of its guardians and the difficulty of those mountains. Indeed the Gondothlim were mighty archers, and bows they made of a marvel of power. Therewith might they shoot an arrow into heaven seven times as far as could the best bowman among Men shoot at a mark upon the ground; and they would have suffered no falcon to hover long over their plain or snake to crawl therein; for they liked not creatures of blood, broodlings of Melko.

Now in those days was Eärendel one year old when these ill tidings came to that city of the spies of Melko and how they encompassed the vale of Tumladin around. Then Turgonâs heart was saddened, remembering the words of Tuor in past years before the palace doors; and he caused the watch and ward to be thrice strengthened at all points, and engines of war to be devised by his artificers and set upon the hill. Poisonous fires and hot liquids, arrows and great rocks, was he prepared to shoot down on any who would assail those gleaming walls; and then he abode as well content as might be, but Tuorâs heart was heavier than the kingâs, for now the words of Ulmo came ever to his mind, and their purport and gravity he understood more deeply than of old; nor did he find any great comfort in Idril, for her heart boded more darkly even than his own.

Know then that Idril had a great power of piercing with her thought the darkness of the hearts of Elves and Men, and the glooms of the future theretoâfurther even than is the common power of the kindreds of the EldaliÃ« therefore she spake thus on a day to Tuor: âKnow, my husband, that my heart misgÃ«ves me for doubt of Meglin, and I fear that he will bring an ill on this fair realm, though by no means may I see how or whenâyet I dread lest all that he knows of our doings and preparations become in some manner known to the Foe, so that he devise a new means of whelming us, against which we have thought of no defence. Lo! I dreamed on a night that Meglin builded a furnace, and coming at us unawares flung therein Eärendel our babe, and would after thrust in thee and me; but that for sorrow at the death of our fair child I would not resist.â

And Tuor answered: âThere is reason for thy fear, for neither is my heart good towards Meglin; yet is he the nephew of the king and thine own cousin, nor is there charge against him, and I see nought to do but to abide and watch.â

But Idril said: âThis is my rede thereto: gather thou in deep secret those delvers and quarrymen who by careful trial are found to hold least love for Meglin by reason of the pride and arrogance of his dealings among them. From these thou must choose trusty men to keep watch upon Meglin whenso he fares to the outer hills, yet I counsel thee to set the greater part of those in whose secrecy thou canst confide at a hidden delving, and to devise with their aidâhowsoever cautious and slow that labour beâa secret way from thy house here beneath the rocks of this hill unto the vale below. Now this way must not lead toward the Way of Escape, for my heart bids me trust it not, but even to that far distant pass, the Cleft of Eagles in the southern mountains; and the further this delving reach thitherward beneath the plain so much the better would I esteem itâyet let all this labour be kept dark save from a few.â

Now there are none such delvers of earth or rock as the Noldoli (and this Melko knows), but in those places is the earth of a great hardness; and Tuor said: âThe rocks of the hill of Amon Gwareth are as iron, and only with much travail may they be cloven; yet if this be done in secret then must great time and patience be added; but the stone of the floor of the Vale of Tumladin is as forged steel, nor may it be hewn without the knowledge of the Gondothlim save in moons and years.â

Idril said then: âSooth this may be, but such is my rede, and there is yet time to spare.â Then Tuor said that he might not see all its purport, âbut âbetter is any plan than a lack of counselâ, and I will do even as thou sayestâ.

Now it so chanced that not long after Meglin went to the hills for the getting of ore, and straying in the mountains alone was taken by some of the Orcs prowling there, and they would do him evil and terrible hurt, knowing him to be a man of the Gondothlim. This was however unknown of Tuorâs watchers. But evil came into the heart of Meglin, and he said to his captors: âKnow then that I am Meglin son of Eârl who had to wife Isfin sister of Turgon king of the Gondothlim.â But they said: âWhat is that to us?â And Meglin answered: âMuch is it to you; for if you slay me, be it speedy or slow, ye will lose great tidings concerning the city of Gondolin that your master would rejoice to hear.â Then the Orcs stayed their hands, and said they would give him life if the matters he opened to them seemed to merit that; and Meglin told them of all the fashion of that plain and city, of its walls and their height and thickness, and the valour of its gates; of the host of men at arms who now obeyed Turgon he spake, and the countless hoard of weapons gathered for their equipment, of the engines of war and the venomous fires.

Then the Orcs were wroth, and having heard these matters were yet for slaying him there and then as one who impudently enlarged the power of his miserable folk to the mockery of the great might and puissance of Melko; but Meglin catching at a straw said: âThink ye not that ye would rather pleasure your master if ye bore to his feet so noble a captive, that he might hear my tidings of himself and judge of their verity?â

Now this seemed good to the Orcs, and they returned from the mountains about Gondolin to the Hills of Iron and the dark halls of Melko; thither they haled Meglin with them, and now was he in a sore dread. But when he knelt before the black throne of Melko in terror of the grimness of the shapes about him, of the wolves that sat beneath that chair and of the adders that twined about its legs, Melko bade him speak. Then told he those tidings, and Melko hearkening spake very fair to him, that the insolence of his heart in great measure returned.

Now the end of this was that Melko aided by the cunning of Meglin devised a plan for the overthrow of Gondolin. For this Meglinâs reward was to be a great captaincy among the Orcsâyet Melko purposed not in his heart to fulfil such a promiseâbut Tuor and Eärendel should Melko burn, and Idril be given to Meglinâs armsâand such promises was that evil one fain to redeem. Yet as meed of treachery did Melko threaten Meglin with the torment of the Balrogs. Now these were demons with whips of flame and claws of steel by whom he tormented those of the Noldoli who durst withstand him in anythingâand the Eldar have called them Malkarauki. But the rede that Meglin gave to Melko was that not all the host of the Orcs nor the Balrogs in their fierceness might by assault or siege hope ever to overthrow the walls and gates of Gondolin even if they availed to win unto the plain without. Therefore he counselled Melko to devise out of his sorceries a succour for his warriors in their endeavour. From the greatness of his wealth of metals and his powers of fire he bid him make beasts like snakes and dragons of irresistible might that should overcreep the Encircling Hills and lap that plain and its fair city in flame and death.

Then Meglin was bidden fare home lest at his absence men suspect somewhat; but Melko wove about him the spell of bottomless dread, and he had thereafter neither joy nor quiet in his heart. Nonetheless he wore a fair mask of good liking and gaiety, so that men said: âMeglin is softenedâ, and he was held in less disfavour; yet Idril feared him the more. Now Meglin said: âI have laboured much and am minded to rest, and to join in the dance and the song and the merrymakings of the folkâ, and he went no more quarrying stone or ore in the hills: yet in sooth he sought herein to drown his fear and disquiet. A dread possessed him that Melko was ever at hand, and this came of the spell; and he durst never again wander amid the mines lest he again fall in with the Orcs and be bidden once more to the terrors of the halls of darkness.

Now the years fare by, and egged by Idril Tuor keepeth ever at his secret delving; but seeing that the leaguer of spies hath grown thinner Turgon dwelleth more at ease and in less fear. Yet these years are filled by Melko in the utmost ferment of labour, and all the thrall-folk of the Noldoli must dig unceasingly for metals while Melko sitteth and deviseth fires and calleth flames and smokes to come from the lower heats, nor doth he suffer any of the Noldoli to stray ever a foot from their places of bondage. Then on a time Melko assembled all his most cunning smiths and sorcerers, and of iron and flame they wrought a host of monsters such as have only at that time been seen and shall not again be till the Great End. Some were all of iron so cunningly linked that they might flow like slow rivers of metal or coil themselves around and above all obstacles before them, and these were filled in their innermost depths with the grimmest of the Orcs with scimitars and spears; others of bronze and copper were given hearts and spirits of blazing fire, and they blasted all that stood before them with the terror of their snorting or trampled whatso escaped the ardour of their breath; yet others were creatures of pure flame that writhed like ropes of molten metal, and they brought to ruin whatever fabric they came nigh, and iron and stone melted before them and became as water, and upon them rode the Balrogs in hundreds; and these were the most dire of all those monsters which Melko devised against Gondolin.

Now when the seventh summer had gone since the treason of Meglin, and Eärendel was yet of very tender years though a valorous child, Melko withdrew all his spies, for every path and corner of the mountains was now known to him; yet the Gondothlim thought in their unwariness that Melko would no longer seek against them, perceiving their might and the impregnable strength of their dwelling.

But Idril fell into a dark mood and the light of her face was clouded, and many wondered thereat; yet Turgon reduced the watch and ward to its ancient numbers, and to somewhat less, and as autumn came and the gathering of fruits was over folk turned with glad hearts to the feasts of winter: but Tuor stood upon the battlements and gazed upon the Encircling Hills.

Now behold, Idril stood beside him, and the wind was in her hair, and Tuor thought that she was exceeding beautiful, and stooped to kiss her; but her face was sad, and she said: "Now come the days when thou must make choice," and Tuor knew not what she said. Then drawing him within their halls she said to him how her heart misgave her for fear concerning Eärendel her son, and for boding that some great evil was nigh, and that Melko would be at the bottom of it. Then Tuor would comfort her, but might not, and she questioned him concerning the secret delving, and he said how it now led a league into the plain, and at that was her heart somewhat lightened. But still she counselled that the delving be pressed on, and that henceforth should speed weigh more than secrecy, "because now is the time very near." And another rede she gave him, and this he took also, that certain of the bravest and most true among the lords and warriors of the Gondothlim be chosen with care and told of that secret way and its issue. These she counselled him to make into a stout guard and to give them his emblem to wear that they become his folk, and to do thus under pretext of the right and dignity of a great lord, kinsman to the king. âMoreover,â said she, âI will get my fatherâs favour to that.â In secret too she whispered to folk that if the city came to its last stand or Turgon be slain that they rally about Tuor and her son, and to this they laughed a yea, saying however that Gondolin would stand as long as Taniquetil or the Mountains of Valinor.

Yet to Turgon she spoke not openly, nor suffered Tuor to do so, as he desired, despite their love and reverence for himâa great and a noble and a glorious king he wasâseeing that he trusted in Meglin and held with blind obstinacy his belief in the impregnable might of the city and that Melko sought no more against it, perceiving no hope therein. Now in this he was ever strengthened by the cunning sayings of Meglin. Behold, the guile of that Gnome was very great, for he wrought much in the dark, so that folk said: âHe doth well to bear the sign of a sable moleâ and by reason of the folly of certain of the quarrymen, and yet more by reason of the loose words of certain among his kin to whom word was somewhat unwarily spoken by Tuor, he gathered a knowledge of the secret work and laid against that a plan of his own.

So winter deepened, and it was very cold for those regions, so that frost fared about the plain of Tumladin and ice lay on its pools; yet the fountains played ever on Amon Gwareth and the two trees blossomed, and folk made merry till the day of terror that was hidden in the heart of Melko.

In these ways that bitter winter passed, and the snows lay deeper than ever before on the Encircling Hills; yet in its time a spring of wondrous glory melted the skirts of those white mantles and the valley drank the waters and burst into flowers. So came and passed with revelry of children the festival of Nost-na-Lothion or the Birth of Flowers, and the hearts of the Gondothlim were uplifted for the good promise of the year; and now at length is that great feast Tarnin Austa or the Gates of Summer near at hand. For know that on a night it was their custom to begin a solemn ceremony at midnight, continuing it even till the dawn of Tarnin Austa broke, and no voice was uttered in the city from midnight till the break of day, but the dawn they hailed with ancient songs. For years uncounted had the coming of summer thus been greeted with music of choirs, standing upon their gleaming eastern wall; and now comes even the night of vigil and the city is filled with silver lamps, while in the groves upon the new-leaved trees lights of jewelled colours swing, and low musics go along the ways, but no voice sings until the dawn.

The sun has sunk beyond the hills and folk array them for the festival very gladly and eagerlyâglancing in expectation to the East. Lo! even when she had gone and all was dark, a new light suddenly began, and a glow there was, but it was beyond the northward heights,²⁶ and men marvelled, and there was a thronging of the walls and battlements. Then wonder grew to doubt as that light waxed and became yet redder, and doubt to dread as men saw the snow upon the mountains dyed as it were with blood. And thus it was that the fire-serpents of Melko came upon Gondolin.

Then came over the plain riders who bore breathless tidings from those who kept vigil on the peaks; and they told of the fiery hosts and the shapes like dragons, and said: âMelko is upon us.â Great was the fear and anguish within that beauteous city, and the streets and byeways were filled with the weeping of women and the wailing of children, and the squares with the mustering of soldiers and the ring of arms. There were the gleaming banners of all the great houses and kindreds of the Gondothlim. Mighty was the array of the house of the king and their colours were white and gold and red, and their emblems the moon and the sun and the scarlet heart.²⁷ Now in the midmost of these stood Tuor above all heads, and his mail of silver gleamed; and about him was a press of the stoutest of the folk. Lo! all these wore wings as it were of swans or gulls upon their helms, and the emblem of the White Wing was upon their shields. But the folk of Meglin were drawn up in the same place, and sable was their harness, and they bore no sign or emblem, but their round caps of steel were covered with moleskin, and they fought with axes two-headed like mattocks. There Meglin prince of Gondobar gathered many warriors of dark countenance and lowering gaze about him, and a ruddy glow shone upon their faces and gleamed about the polished surfaces of their accoutrement. Behold, all the hills to the north were ablaze, and it was as if rivers of fire ran down the slopes that led to the plain of Tumladin, and folk might already feel the heat thereof.

And many other kindreds were there, the folk of the Swallow and the Heavenly Arch, and from these folk came the greatest number and the best of the bowmen, and they were arrayed upon the broad places of the walls. Now the folk of the Swallow bore a fan of feathers on their helms, and they were arrayed in white and dark blue and in purple and black and showed an arrowhead on their shields. Their lord was Duilin, swiftest of all men to run and leap and surest of archers at a mark. But they of the Heavenly Arch being a folk of uncounted wealth were arrayed in a glory of colours, and their arms were set with jewels that flamed in the light now over the sky. Every shield of that battalion was of the blue of the heavens and its boss a jewel built of seven gems, rubies and amethysts and sapphires, emeralds, chrysoprase, topaz, and amber, but an opal of great size was set in their helms. Egalmoth was their chieftain, and wore a blue mantle upon which the stars were broidered in crystal, and his sword was bentânow none else of the Noldoli bore curved swordsâyet he trusted rather to the bow, and shot therewith further than any among that host.

There too were the folk of the Pillar and of the Tower of Snow, and both these kindreds were marshalled by Penlod, tallest of Gnomes. There were those of the Tree, and they were a great house, and their raiment was green. They fought with iron-studded clubs or with slings, and their lord Galdor was held the most valiant of all the Gondothlim save Turgon alone. There stood the house of the Golden Flower who bare a rayed sun upon their shield, and their chief Glorfindel bare a mantle so broidered in threads of gold that it was diapered with celandine as a field in spring; and his arms were damascened with cunning gold.

Then came there from the south of the city the people of the Fountain, and Ecthelion was their lord, and silver and diamonds were their delight; and swords very long and bright and pale did they wield, and they went into battle to the music of flutes. Behind them came the host of the Harp, and this was a battalion of brave warriors; but their leader Salgant was a craven, and he fawned upon Meglin. They were dight with tassels of silver and tassels of gold, and a harp of silver shone in their blazonry upon a field of black; but Salgant bore one of gold, and he alone rode into battle of all the sons of the Gondothlim, and he was heavy and squat.

Now the last of the battalions was furnished by the folk of the Hammer of Wrath, and of these came many of the best smiths and craftsmen, and all that kindred revered Aulë the Smith more than all other Ainur. They fought with great maces like hammers, and their shields were heavy, for their arms were very strong. In older days they had been much recruited by Noldoli who escaped from the mines of Melko, and the hatred of this house for the works of that evil one and the Balrogs his demons was exceeding great. Now their leader was Rog, strongest of the Gnomes, scarce second in valour to that Galdor of the Tree. The sign of this people was the Stricken Anvil, and a hammer that smiteth sparks about it was set on their shields, and red gold and black iron was their delight. Very numerous was that battalion, nor had any amongst them a faint heart, and they won the greatest glory of all those fair houses in that struggle against doom; yet were they ill-fated, and none ever fared away from that field, but fell about Rog and vanished from the Earth; and with them much craftsmanship and skill has been lost for ever.²⁸

This was the fashion and the array of the eleven houses of the Gondothlim with their signs and emblems, and the bodyguard of Tuor, the folk of the Wing, was accounted the twelfth. Now is the face of that chieftain grim and he looks not to live long and there in his house upon the walls Idril arrays herself in mail, and seeks Eärendel. And that child was in tears for the strange lights of red that played about the walls of the chamber where he slept; and tales that his nurse Meleth had woven him concerning fiery Melko at times of his waywardness came to him and troubled him. But his mother coming set about him a tiny coat of mail that she had let fashion in secret, and at that time he was glad and exceeding proud, and he shouted for pleasure. Yet Idril wept, for much had she cherished in her heart the fair city and her goodly house, and the love of Tuor and herself that had dwelt therein; but now she saw its destroying nigh at hand, and feared that her contriving would fail against this overwhelming might of the terror of the serpents.

It was now four hours still from middle night, and the sky was red in the north and in the east and west; and those serpents of iron had reached the levels of Tumladin, and those fiery ones were among the lowest slopes of the hills, so that the guards were taken and set in evil torment by the Balrogs that scoured all about; saving only to the furthest south where was Cristhorn the Cleft of Eagles.

Then did King Turgon call a council, and thither fared Tuor and Meglin as royal princes; and Duilin came with Egalthorn and Penlod the tall, and Rog strode thither with Galdor of the Tree and golden Glorfindel and Ecthelion of the voice of music. Thither too fared Salgant atremble at the tidings, and other nobles beside of less blood but better heart.

Then spake Tuor and this was his rede, that a mighty sally be made forthwith, ere the light and heat grew too great in the plain; and many backed him, being but of different minds as to whether the sally should be made by the entire host with the maids and wives and children amidmost, or by diverse bands seeking out in many directions; and to this last Tuor leaned.

But Meglin and Salgant alone held other counsel and were for holding to the city and seeking to guard those treasures that lay within. Out of guile did Meglin speak thus, fearing lest any of the Noldoli escape the doom that he had brought upon them for the saving of his skin, and he dreaded lest his treason become known and somehow vengeance find him in after days. But Salgant spake both echoing Meglin and being grievously afraid of issuing from the city, for he was fain rather to do battle from an impregnable fortress than to risk hard blows upon the field.

Then the lord of the house of the Mole played upon the one weakness of Turgon, saying: "Lo! O King, the city of Gondolin contains a wealth of jewels and metals and stuffs and of things wrought by the hands of the Gnomes to surpassing beauty, and all these thy lordsâmore brave meseems than wiseâwould abandon to the Foe. Even should victory be thine upon the plain thy city will be sacked and the Balrogs get hence with a measureless bootyâ and Turgon groaned, for Meglin had known his great love for the wealth and loveliness of that burg²⁹ upon Amon Gwareth. Again said Meglin, putting fire in his voice: "Lo! Hast thou for nought laboured through years uncounted at the building of walls of impregnable thickness and in the making of gates whose valour may not be overthrown; is the power of the hill Amon Gwareth become as lowly as the deep vale, or the hoard of weapons that lie upon it and its unnumbered arrows of so little worth that in the hour of peril thou wouldst cast all aside and go naked into the open against enemies of steel and fire, whose trampling shakes the earth and the Encircling Mountains ring with the clamour of their footsteps?â

And Salgant quaked to think of it and spake noisily, saying: âMeglin speaks well, O King, hear thou him.â Then the king took the counsel of those twain though all the lords said otherwise, nay rather the more for that: therefore at his bidding does all that folk abide now the assault upon their walls. But Tuor wept and left the kingâs hall, and gathering the men of the Wing went through the streets seeking his home; and by that hour was the light great and lurid and there was stifling heat and a black smoke and stench arose about the pathways to the city.

And now came the Monsters across the valley and the white towers of Gondolin reddened before them; but the stoutest were in dread seeing those dragons of fire and those serpents of bronze and iron that fare already about the hill of the city; and they shot unavailing arrows at them. Then is there a cry of hope, for behold, the snakes of fire may not climb the hill for its steepness and for its glassiness, and by reason of the quenching waters that fall upon its sides; yet they lie about its feet and a vast steam arises where the streams of Amon Gwareth and the flames of the serpents drive together. Then grew there such a heat that women became faint and men sweated to weariness beneath their mail, and all the springs of the city, save only the fountain of the king, grew hot and smoked.

But now Gothmog lord of Balrogs, captain of the hosts of Melko, took counsel and gathered all his things of iron that could coil themselves around and above all obstacles before them. These he bade pile themselves before the northern gate; and behold, their great spires reached even to its threshold and thrust at the towers and bastions about it, and by reason of the exceeding heaviness of their bodies those gates fell, and great was the noise thereof: yet the most of the walls around them still stood firm. Then the engines and the catapults of the king poured darts and boulders and molten metals on those ruthless beasts, and their hollow bellies clanged beneath the buffeting, yet it availed not for they might not be broken, and the fires rolled off them. Then were the topmost opened about their middles, and an innumerable host of the Orcs, the goblins of hatred, poured therefrom into the breach; and who shall tell of the gleam of their scimitars or the flash of the broad-bladed spears with which they stabbed?

Then did Rog shout in a mighty voice, and all the people of the Hammer of Wrath and the kindred of the Tree with Galdor the valiant leapt at the foe. There the blows of their great hammers and the dint of their clubs rang to the Encircling Mountains and the Orcs fell like leaves; and those of the Swallow and the Arch poured arrows like the dark rains of autumn upon them, and both Orcs and Gondothlim fell thereunder for the smoke and the confusion. Great was that battle, yet for all their valour the Gondothlim by reason of the might of ever increasing numbers were borne slowly backwards till the goblins held part of the northernmost city.

At this time is Tuor at the head of the folk of the Wing struggling in the turmoil of the streets, and now he wins through to his house and finds that Meglin is before him. Trusting in the battle now begun about the northern gate and in the uproar in the city, Meglin had looked to this hour for the consummation of his designs. Learning much of the secret delving of Tuor (yet only at the last moment had he got this knowledge and he could not discover all) he said nought to the king or any other, for it was his thought that of a surety that tunnel would go in the end toward the Way of Escape, this being the most nigh to the city, and he had a mind to use this to his good, and to the ill of the Noldoli. Messengers by great stealth he despatched to Melko to set a guard about the outer issue of that Way when the assault was made; but he himself thought now to take Eärendel and cast him into the fire beneath the walls, and seizing Idril he would constrain her to guide him to the secrets of the passage, that he might win out of this terror of fire and slaughter and drag her withal along with him to the lands of Melko. Now Meglin was afear'd that even the secret token which Melko had given him would fail in that direful sack, and was minded to help that Ainu to the fulfilment of his promises of safety. No doubt had he however of the death of Tuor in that great burning, for to Salgant he had confided the task of delaying him in the king's halls and egging him straight thence into the deadliest of the fight—but lo! Salgant fell into a terror unto death, and he rode home and lay there now awake on his bed; but Tuor fared home with the folk of the Wing.

Now Tuor did this, though his valour leapt to the noise of war, that he might take farewell of Idril and Eärendel, and speed them with a bodyguard down the secret way ere he returned himself to the battle throng to die if must be: but he found a press of the Mole-folk about his door, and these were the grimmest and least good-hearted of folk that Meglin might get in that city. Yet were they free Noldoli and under no spell of Melkoas like their master, wherefore though for the lordship of Meglin they aided not Idril, no more would they touch of his purpose despite all his curses.

Now then Meglin had Idril by the hair and sought to drag her to the battlements out of cruelty of heart, that she might see the fall of Eärendel to the flames; but he was cumbered by that child, and she fought, alone as she was, like a tigress for all her beauty and slenderness. There he now struggles and delays amid oaths while that folk of the Wing draw nigh and lo! Tuor gives a shout so great that the Orcs hear it afar and waver at the sound of it. Like a crash of tempest the guard of the Wing were amid the men of the Mole, and these were stricken asunder. When Meglin saw this he would stab Eärendel with a short knife he had; but that child bit his left hand, that his teeth sank in, and he staggered, and stabbed weakly, and the mail of the small coat turned the blade aside; and thereupon Tuor was upon him and his wrath was terrible to see. He seized Meglin by that hand that held the knife and broke the arm with the wrench, and then taking him by the middle leapt with him upon the walls, and flung him far out. Great was the fall of his body, and it smote Amon Gwareth three times ere it pitched in the midmost of the flames; and the name of Meglin has gone out in shame from among Eldar and Noldoli.

Then the warriors of the Mole being more numerous than those few of the Wing, and loyal to their lord, came at Tuor, and there were great blows, but no man might stand before the wrath of Tuor, and they were smitten and driven to fly into what dark holes they might, or flung from the walls. Then Tuor and his men must get them to the battle of the Gate, for the noise of it has grown very great, and Tuor has it still in his heart that the city may stand; yet with Idril he left there Voronwë against his will and some other swordsmen to be a guard for her till he returned or might send tidings from the fray.

Now was the battle at that gate very evil indeed, and Duilin of the Swallow as he shot from the walls was smitten by a fiery bolt of the Balrogs who leapt about the base of Amon Gwareth; and he fell from the battlements and perished. Then the Balrogs continued to shoot darts of fire and flaming arrows like small snakes into the sky, and these fell upon the roofs and gardens of Gondolin till all the trees were scorched, and the flowers and grass burned up, and the whiteness of those walls and colonnades was blackened and seared: yet a worse matter was it that a company of those demons climbed upon the coils of the serpents of iron and thence loosed unceasingly from their bows and slings till a fire began to burn in the city to the back of the main army of the defenders.

Then said Rog in a great voice: "Who now shall fear the Balrogs for all their terror? See before us the accursed ones who for ages have tormented the children of the Noldoli, and who now set a fire at our backs with their shooting. Come ye of the Hammer of Wrath and we will smite them for their evil." Thereupon he lifted his mace, and its handle was long; and he made a way before him by the wrath of his onset even unto the fallen gate: but all the people of the Stricken Anvil ran behind like a wedge, and sparks came from their eyes for the fury of their rage. A great deed was that sally, as the Noldoli sing yet, and many of the Orcs were borne backward into the fires below; but the men of Rog leapt even upon the coils of the serpents and came at those Balrogs and smote them grievously, for all they had whips of flame and claws of steel, and were in stature very great. They battered them into nought, or catching at their whips wielded these against them, that they tore them even as they had aforetime torn the Gnomes; and the number of Balrogs that perished was a marvel and dread to the hosts of Melko, for ere that day never had any of the Balrogs been slain by the hand of Elves or Men.

Then Gothmog Lord of Balrogs gathered all his demons that were about the city and ordered them thus: a number made for the folk of the Hammer and gave before them, but the greater company rushing upon the flank contrived to get to their backs, higher upon the coils of the drakes and nearer to the gates, so that Rog might not win back save with great slaughter among his folk. But Rog seeing this essayed not to win back, as was hoped, but with all his folk fell on those whose part was to give before him; and they fled before him now of dire need rather than of craft. Down into the plain were they harried, and their shrieks rent the airs of Tumladin. Then that house of the Hammer fared about smiting and hewing the astonished bands of Melko till they were hemmed at the last by an overwhelming force of the Orcs and the Balrogs, and a fire-drake was loosed upon them. There did they perish about Rog hewing to the last till iron and flame overcame them, and it is yet sung that each man of the Hammer of Wrath took the lives of seven foemen to pay for his own. Then did dread fall more heavily still upon the Gondothlim at the death of Rog and the loss of his battalion, and they gave back further yet into the city, and Penlod perished there in a lane with his back to the wall, and about him many of the men of the Pillar and many of the Tower of Snow.

Now therefore Melko's goblins held all the gate and a great part of the walls on either side, whence numbers of the Swallow and those of the Rainbow were thrust to doom; but within the city they had won a great space reaching nigh to the centre, even to the Place of the Well that adjoined the Square of the Palace. Yet about those ways and around the gate their dead were piled in uncounted heaps, and they halted therefore and took counsel, seeing that for the valour of the Gondothlim they had lost many more than they had hoped and far more than those defenders. Fearful too they were for that slaughter Rog had done amid the Balrogs, because of those demons they had great courage and confidence of heart.

Now then the plan that they made was to hold what they had won, while those serpents of bronze and with great feet for trampling climbed slowly over those of iron, and reaching the walls there opened a breach wherethrough the Balrogs might ride upon the dragons of flame: yet they knew this must be done with speed, for the heats of those drakes lasted not for ever, and might only be plenished from the wells of fire that Melko had made in the fastness of his own land.

But even as their messengers were sped they heard a sweet music that was played amid the host of the Gondothlim and they feared what it might mean; and lo! there came Ecthelion and the people of the Fountain whom Turgon till now had held in reserve, for he watched the most of that affray from the heights of his tower. Now marched these folk to a great playing of their flutes, and the crystal and silver of their array was most lovely to see amid the red light of the fires and the blackness of the ruins.

Then on a sudden their music ceased and Ecthelion of the fair voice shouted for the drawing of swords, and before the Orcs might foresee his onslaught the flashing of those pale blades was amongst them. 'Tis said that Ecthelion's folk there slew more of the goblins than fell ever in all the battles of the EldaliÃ« with that race, and that his name is a terror among them to this latest day, and a warcry to the Eldar.

Now it is that Tuor and the men of the Wing fare into the fight and range themselves beside Ecthelion and those of the Fountain, and the twain strike mighty blows and ward each many a thrust from the other, and harry the Orcs so that they win back almost to the gate. But there behold a quaking and a trampling, for the dragons labour mightily at beating a path up Amon Gwareth and at casting down the walls of the city; and already there is a gap therein and a confusion of masonry where the ward-towers have fallen in ruin. Bands of the Swallow and of the Arch of Heaven there fight bitterly amid the wreck or contest the walls to east and west with the foe; but even as Tuor comes nigh driving the Orcs, one of those brazen snakes heaves against the western wall and a great mass of it shakes and falls, and behind comes a creature of fire and Balrogs upon it. Flames gust from the jaws of that worm and folk wither before it, and the wings of the helm of Tuor are blackened, but he stands and gathers about him his guard and all of the Arch and Swallow he can find, whereas on his right Ecthelion rallies the men of the Fountain of the South.

Now the Orcs again take heart from the coming of the drakes, and they mingle with the Balrogs that pour about the breach, and they assail the Gondothlim grievously. There Tuor slew Othrod a lord of the Orcs cleaving his helm, and Balcmege he hewed asunder, and Lug he smote with his axe that his limbs were cut from beneath him at the knee, but Ecthelion shore through two captains of the goblins at a sweep and cleft the head of Orcobal their chiefest champion to his teeth; and by reason of the great doughtiness of those two lords they came even unto the Balrogs. Of those demons of power Ecthelion slew three, for the brightness of his sword cleft the iron of them and did hurt to their fire, and they writhed; yet of the leap of that axe Dramborleg that was swung by the hand of Tuor were they still more afraid, for it sang like the rush of eagle's wings in the air and took death as it fell, and five of them went down before it.

But so it is that few cannot fight always against the many, and Ecthelion's left arm got a sore rent from a whip of the Balrog's and his shield fell to earth even as that dragon of fire drew nigh amid the ruin of the walls. Then Ecthelion must lean on Tuor, and Tuor might not leave him, though the very feet of the trampling beast were upon them, and they were like to be overborne: but Tuor hewed at a foot of the creature so that flame spouted forth, and that serpent screamed, lashing with its tail; and many of both Orcs and Noldoli got their death therefrom. Now Tuor gathered his might and lifted Ecthelion, and amid a remnant of the folk got thereunder and escaped the drake; yet dire was the killing of men that beast had wrought, and the Gondothlim were sorely shaken.

Thus it was that Tuor son of Peleg gave before the foe, fighting as he yielded ground, and bore from that battle Ecthelion of the Fountain, but the drakes and the foemen held half the city and all the north of it. Thence marauding bands fared about the streets and did much ransacking, or slew in the dark men and women and children, and many, if occasion let, they bound and led back and flung in the iron chambers amid the dragons of iron, that they might drag them afterward to be thralls of Melko.

Now Tuor reached the Square of the Folkwell by a way entering from the north, and found there Galdor denying the western entry by the Arch of Inwä« to a horde of the goblins, but about him was now but a few of those men of the Tree. There did Galdor become the salvation of Tuor, for he fell behind his men stumbling beneath Ecthelion over a body that lay in the dark, and the Orcs had taken them both but for the sudden rush of that champion and the dint of his club.

There were the scatterlings of the guard of the Wing and of the houses of the Tree and the Fountain, and of the Swallow and the Arch, welded to a good battalion, and by the counsel of Tuor they gave way out of that Place of the Well, seeing that the Square of the King that lay next was the more defensible. Now that place had aforetime contained many beautiful trees, both oak and poplar, around a great well of vast depth and great purity of water; yet at that hour it was full of the riot and ugliness of those hideous people of Melko, and those waters were polluted with their carcases.

Thus comes the last stout gathering of those defenders in the Square of the Palace of Turgon. Among them are many wounded and fainting, and Tuor is weary for the labours of the night and the weight of Ecthelion who is in a deadly swoon. Even as he led that battalion in by the Road of Arches from the north-west (and they had much ado to prevent any foe getting behind their backs) a noise arose at the eastward of the square, and lo! Glorfindel is driven in with the last of the men of the Golden Flower.

Now these had sustained a terrible conflict in the Great Market to the east of the city, where a force of Orcs led by Balrogs came on them at unawares as they marched by a circuitous way to the fight about the gate. This they did to surprise the foe upon his left flank, but were themselves ambuscaded; there fought they bitterly for hours till a fire-drake new-come from the breach overwhelmed them, and Glorfindel cut his way out very hardly and with few men; but that place with its stores and its goodly things of fine workmanship was a waste of flames.

The story tells that Turgon had sent the men of the Harp to their aid because of the urgency of messengers from Glorfindel, but Salgant concealed this bidding from them, saying they were to garrison the square of the Lesser Market to the south where he dwelt, and they fretted thereat. Now however they brake from Salgant and were come before the king's hall; and that was very timely, for a triumphant press of foemen was at Glorfindel's heels. On these the men of the Harp unbidden fell with great eagerness and utterly redeemed the cravenhood of their lord, driving the enemy back into the market, and being leaderless fared even over wrathfully, so that many of them were trapped in the flames or sank before the breath of the serpent that revelled there.

Tuor now drank of the great fountain and was refreshed, and loosening Ecthelion's helm gave him to drink, splashing his face that his swoon left him. Now those lords Tuor and Glorfindel clear the square and withdraw all the men they may from the entrances and bar them with barriers, save as yet on the south. Even from that region comes now Egalmoth. He had had charge of the engines on the wall; but long since deeming matters to call rather for handstrokes about the streets than shooting upon the battlements he gathered some of the Arch and of the Swallow about him, and cast away his bow. Then did they fare about the city dealing good blows whenever they fell in with bands of the enemy. Thereby he rescued many bands of captives and gathered no few wandering and driven men, and so got to the Kingâs Square with hard fighting; and men were fain to greet him for they had feared him dead. Now are all the women and children that had gathered there or been brought in by Egalmoth stowed in the kingâs halls, and the ranks of the houses made ready for the last. In that host of survivors are some, be it however few, of all the kindreds save of the Hammer of Wrath alone; and the kingâs house is as yet untouched. Nor is this any shame, for their part was ever to bide fresh to the last and defend the king.

But now the men of Melko have assembled their forces, and seven dragons of fire are come with Orcs about them and Balrogs upon them down all the ways from north, east, and west, seeking the Square of the King. Then there was carnage at the barriers, and Egalmoth and Tuor went from place to place of the defence, but Ecthelion lay by the fountain; and that stand was the most stubborn-valiant that is remembered in all the songs or in any tale. Yet at long last a drake bursts the barrier to the north and there had once been the issue of the Alley of Roses and a fair place to see or to walk in, but now there is but a lane of blackness and it is filled with noise.

Tuor stood then in the way of that beast, but was sundered from Egalmoth, and they pressed him backward even to the centre of the square nigh the fountain. There he became weary from the strangling heat and was beaten down by a great demon, even Gothmog lord of Balrogs, son of Melko. But lo! Ecthelion, whose face was of the pallor of grey steel and whose shield-arm hung limp at his side, strode above him as he fell; and that Gnome drove at the demon, yet did not give him his death, getting rather a wound to his sword-arm that his weapon left his grasp. Then leapt Ecthelion lord of the Fountain, fairest of the Noldoli, full at Gothmog even as he raised his whip, and his helm that had a spike upon it he drove into that evil breast, and he twined his legs about his foemanâs thighs; and the Balrog yelled and fell forward; but those two dropped into the basin of the kingâs fountain which was very deep. There found that creature his bane; and Ecthelion sank steel-laden into the depths, and so perished the lord of the Fountain after fiery battle in cool waters.³⁰

Now Tuor had arisen when the assault of Ecthelion gave him space, and seeing that great deed he wept for his love of that fair Gnome of the Fountain, but being wrapped in battle he scarce cut his way to the folk about the palace. There seeing the wavering of the enemy by reason of the dread of the fall of Gothmog the marshal of the hosts, the royal house laid on and the king came down in splendour among them and hewed with them, that they swept again much of the square, and of the Balrogs slew even two score, which is a very great prowess indeed: but greater still did they do, for they hemmed in one of the Fire-drakes for all his flaming, and forced him into the very waters of the fountain that he perished therein. Now this was the end of that fair water; and its pools turned to steam and its spring was dried up, and it shot no more into the heaven, but rather a vast column of vapour arose to the sky and the cloud therefrom floated over all the land.

Then dread fell on all for the doom of the fountain, and the square was filled with mists of scalding heat and blinding fogs, and the people of the royal house were killed therein by heat and by the foe and by the serpents and by one another: but a body of them saved the king, and there was a rally of men beneath Glingol and Bansil.

Then said the king: âGreat is the fall of Gondolinâ, and men shuddered, for such were the words of Amnon the prophet of old;³¹ but Tuor speaking wildly for ruth and love of the king cried: âGondolin stands yet, and Ulmo will not suffer it to perish!â Now were they at that time standing, Tuor by the Trees and the king upon the Stairs, as they had stood aforetime when Tuor spake the embassy of Ulmo. But Turgon said: âEvil have I brought upon the Flower of the Plain in despite of Ulmo, and now he leaveth it to wither in the fire. Lo! hope is no more in my heart for my city of loveliness, but the children of the Noldoli shall not be worsted for ever.â

Then did the Gondothlim clash their weapons, for many stood nigh, but Turgon said: âFight not against doom, O my children! Seek ye who may safety in flight, if perhaps there be time yet: but let Tuor have your lealty.â But Tuor said: âThou art kingâ and Turgon made answer: âYet no blow will I strike moreâ, and he cast his crown at the roots of Glingol. Then did Galdor who stood there pick it up, but Turgon accepted it not, and bare of head climbed to the topmost pinnacle of that white tower that stood nigh his palace. There he shouted in a voice like a horn blown among the mountains, and all that were gathered beneath the Trees and the foemen in the mists of the square heard him: "Great is the victory of the Noldoli!" And 'tis said that it was then middle night, and that the Ores yelled in derision.

Then did men speak of a sally, and were of two minds. Many held that it were impossible to burst through, nor might they even so get over the plain or through the hills, and that it were better therefore to die about the king. But Tuor might not think well of the death of so many fair women and children, were it at the hands of their own folk in the last resort, or by the weapons of the enemy, and he spake of the delving and of the secret way. Therefore did he counsel that they beg Turgon to have other mind, and coming among them lead that remnant southward to the walls and the entry of that passage; but he himself burnt with desire to fare thither and know how Idril and Eärendel might be, or to get tidings hence to them and bid them begone speedily, for Gondolin was taken. Now Tuor's plan seemed to the lords desperate indeed—seeing the narrowness of the tunnel and the greatness of the company that must pass it—yet would they fain take this rede in their straits. But Turgon hearkened not, and bid them fare now ere it was too late, and "Let Tuor," said he, "be your guide and your chieftain. But I Turgon will not leave my city, and will burn with it." Then sped they messengers again to the tower, saying: "Sire, who are the Gondothlim if thou perish? Lead us!" But he said: "Lo! I abide here" and a third time, and he said: "If I am king, obey my behests, and dare not to parley further with my commands." After that they sent no more and made ready for the forlorn attempt. But the folk of the royal house that yet lived would not budge a foot, but gathered thickly about the base of the king's tower. "Here," said they, "we will stay if Turgon goes not forth" and they might not be persuaded.

Now was Tuor torn sorely between his reverence for the king and the love for Idril and his child, wherewith his heart was sick; yet already serpents fare about the square trampling upon dead and dying, and the foe gathers in the mists for the last onslaught; and the choice must be made. Then because of the wailing of the women in the halls of the palace and the greatness of his pity for that sad remainder of the peoples of Gondolin, he gathered all that rueful company, maids, children and mothers, and setting them amidmost marshalled as well as he might his men around them. Deepest he set them at flank and at rear, for he purposed falling back southward fighting as best he might with the rearguard as he went; and thus if it might so be to win down the Road of Poms to the Place of the Gods ere any great force be sent to circumvent him. Thence was it his thought to go by the Way of Running Waters past the Fountains of the South to the walls and to his home; but the passage of the secret tunnel he doubted much. Thereupon espying his movement the foe made forthwith a great onslaught upon his left flank and his rearâfrom east and northâeven as he began to withdraw; but his right was covered by the kingâs hall and the head of that column drew already into the Road of Poms.

Then some of the hugest of the drakes came on and glared in the fog, and he must perforce bid the company to go at a run, fighting on the left at haphazard; but Glorfindel held the rear manfully and many more of the Golden Flower fell there. So it was that they passed the Road of Poms and reached Gar Ainion, the Place of the Gods; and this was very open and at its middle the highest ground of all the city. Here Tuor looks for an evil stand and it is scarce in his hope to get much further; but behold, the foe seems already to slacken and scarce any follow them, and this is a wonder. Now comes Tuor at their head to the Place of Wedding, and lo! there stands Idril before him with her hair unbraided as on that day of their marriage before; and great is his amaze. By her stood VoronwÃ« and none other, but Idril saw not even Tuor, for her gaze was set back upon the Place of the King that now lay somewhat below them. Then all that host halted and looked back whither her eyes gazed and their hearts stood still; for now they saw why the foe pressed them so little and the reason of their salvation. Lo! a drake was coiled even on the very steps of the palace and defiled their whiteness; but swarms of the Orcs ransacked within and dragged forth forgotten women and children or slew men that fought alone. Glingol was withered to the stock and Bansil was blackened utterly, and the kingâs tower was beset. High up could they descry the form of the king, but about the base a serpent of iron spouting flame lashed and rowed with his tail, and Balrogs were round him; and there was the king's house in great anguish, and dread cries carried up to the watchers. So was it that the sack of the halls of Turgon and that most valiant stand of the royal house held the mind of the foe, so that Tuor got thence with his company, and stood now in tears upon the Place of the Gods.

Then said Idril: "Woe is me whose father awaiteth doom even upon his topmost pinnacle; but seven times woe whose lord hath gone down before Melko and will stride home no more!â€"for she was distraught with the agony of that night.

Then said Tuor: "Lo! Idril, it is I, and I live; yet now will I get thy father hence, be it from the Hells of Melko!â€" With that he would make down the hill alone, maddened by the grief of his wife; but she coming to her wits in a storm of weeping clasped his knees saying: "My lord! My lord!â€" and delayed him. Yet even as they spake a great noise and a yelling rose from that place of anguish. Behold, the tower leapt into a flame and in a stab of fire it fell, for the dragons crushed the base of it and all who stood there. Great was the clangour of that terrible fall, and therein passed Turgon King of the Gondothlim, and for that hour the victory was to Melko.

Then said Idril heavily: "Sad is the blindness of the wiseâ€" but Tuor said: "Sad too is the stubbornness of those we loveâ€"yet "twas a valiant fault," then stooping he lifted and kissed her, for she was more to him than all the Gondothlim; but she wept bitterly for her father. Then turned Tuor to the captains, saying: "Lo, we must get hence with all speed, lest we be surroundedâ€" and forthwith they moved onward as swiftly as they might and got them far from thence ere the Orcs tired of sacking the palace and rejoicing at the fall of the tower of Turgon.

Now are they in the southward city and meet but scattered bands of plunderers who fly before them; yet do they find fire and burning everywhere for the ruthlessness of that enemy. Women do they meet, some with babes and some laden with chattels, but Tuor would not let them bear away aught save a little food. Coming now at length to a greater quiet Tuor asked Voronwë for tidings, in that Idril spake not and was well-nigh in a swoon; and Voronwë told him of how she and he had waited before the doors of the house while the noise of those battles grew and shook their hearts; and Idril wept for lack of tidings from Tuor. At length she had sped the most part of her guard down the secret way with Eärendel, constraining them to depart with imperious words, yet was her grief great at that sundering. She herself would bide, said she, nor seek to live after her lord; and then she fared about gathering womenfolk and wanderers and speeding them down the tunnel, and smiting marauders with her small band; nor might they dissuade her from bearing a sword.

At length they had fallen in with a band somewhat too numerous, and Voronwë had dragged her thence but by the luck of the Gods, for all else with them perished, and their foe burned Tuor's house; yet found not the secret way. âTherewith,â said Voronwë, âthy lady became distraught of weariness and grief, and fared into the city wildly to my great fearânor might I get her to sally from the burning.â

About the saying of these words were they come to the southern walls and nigh to Tuor's house, and lo! it was cast down and the wreckage was as smoke; and thereat was Tuor bitterly wroth. But there was a noise that boded the approach of Orcs, and Tuor despatched that company as swiftly as might be down that secret way.

Now is there great sorrow upon that staircase as those exiles bid farewell to Gondolin; yet are they without much hope of further life beyond the hills, for how shall any slip from the hand of Melko?

Glad is Tuor when all have passed the entrance and his fear lightens; indeed by the luck of the Valar only can all those folk have got therein unspied of the Orcs. Some now are left who casting aside their arms labour with picks from within and block up the entry of the passage, faring then after the host as they might; but when that folk had descended the stairway to a level with the valley the heat grew to a torment for the fire of the dragons that were about the city; and they were indeed nigh, for the delving was there at no great depth in the earth. Boulders were loosened by the tremors of the ground and falling crushed many, and fumes were in the air so that their torches and lanterns went out. Here they fell over bodies of some that had gone before and perished, and Tuor was in fear for Eärendel; and they pressed on in great darkness and anguish. Nigh two hours were they in that tunnel of the earth, and towards its end it was scarce finished, but rugged at the sides and low.³²

Then came they at the last lessened by wellnigh a tithe to the tunnel's opening, and it debouched cunningly in a large basin where once water had lain, but it was now full of thick bushes. Here were gathered no small press of mingled folk whom Idril and Voronwë sped down the hidden way before them, and they were weeping softly in weariness and sorrow, but Eärendel was not there. Thereat were Tuor and Idril in anguish of heart.³³ Lamentation was there too among all those others, for amidmost of the plain about them loomed afar the hill of Anion Gwareth crowned with flames, where had stood the gleaming city of their home. Fire-drakes are about it and monsters of iron fare in and out of its gates, and great is that sack of the Balrogs and Ores. Somewhat of comfort has this nonetheless for the leaders, for they judge the plain to be nigh empty of Melko's folk save hard by the city, for thither have fared all his evil ones to revel in that destruction.

Now, therefore said Galdor, we must get as far hence toward the Encircling Mountains as may be ere dawn come upon us, and that giveth no great space of time, for summer is at hand.³⁴ Thereat rose a dissension, for a number said that it were folly to make for Cristhorn as Tuor purposed. The sun, say they, will be up long ere we win the foothills, and we shall be whelmed in the plain by those drakes and those demons. Let us fare to Bad Uthwen, the Way of Escape, for that is but half the journeying, and our weary and our wounded may hope to win so far if no further.

Yet Idril spake against this, and persuaded the lords that they trust not to the magic of that way that had aforetime shielded it from discovery: for what magic stands if Gondolin be fallen? Nonetheless a large body of men and women sundered from Tuor and fared to Bad Uthwen, and there into the jaws of a monster who by the guile of Melko at Meglin's rede sat at the outer issue that none came through. But the others, led by one Legolas Greenleaf of the house of the Tree, who knew all that plain by day or by dark, and was night-sighted, made much speed over the vale for all their weariness, and halted only after a great march. Then was all the Earth spread with the grey light of that sad dawn which looked no more on the beauty of Gondolin; but the plain was full of mistsâand that was a marvel, for no mist or fog came there ever before, and this perchance had to do with the doom of the fountain of the king. Again they rose, and covered by the vapours fared long past dawn in safety, till they were already too far away for any to descry them in those misty airs from the hill or from the ruined walls.

Now the Mountains or rather their lowest hills were on that side seven leagues save a mile from Gondolin, and Crithorn the Cleft of Eagles two leagues of upward going from the beginning of the Mountains, for it was at a great height; wherefore they had yet two leagues and part of a third to traverse amid the spurs and foothills, and they were very weary.³⁵ By now the sun hung well above a saddle in the eastern hills, and she was very red and great; and the mists nigh them were lifted, but the ruins of Gondolin were utterly hidden as in a cloud. Behold then at the clearing of the airs they saw, but a few furlongs off, a knot of men that fled on foot, and these were pursued by a strange cavalry, for on great wolves rode Orcs, as they thought, brandishing spears. Then said Tuor: âLo! there is Eärendel my son; behold, his face shineth as a star in the waste,³⁶ and my men of the Wing are about him, and they are in sore straits.â Forthwith he chose fifty of the men that were least weary, and leaving the main company to follow he fared over the plain with that troop as swiftly as they had strength left. Coming now to carry of voice Tuor shouted to the men about Eärendel to stand and flee not, for the wolfriders were scattering them and slaying them piecemeal, and the child was upon the shoulders of one Hendor, a house-carle of Idrilâs, and he seemed like to be left with his burden. Then they stood back to back and Hendor and Eärendel amidmost; but Tuor soon came up, though all his troop were breathless.

Of the wolfriders there were a score, and of the men that were about Eärendel but six living; therefore had Tuor opened his men into a crescent of but one rank, and hoped so to envelop the riders, lest any escaping bring tidings to the main foe and draw ruin upon the exiles. In this he succeeded, so that only two escaped, and therewithal wounded and without their beasts, wherefore were their tidings brought too late to the city.

Glad was Eärendel to greet Tuor, and Tuor most fain of his child; but said Eärendel: âI am thirsty, father, for! have run farânor had Hendor need to bear me.â Thereto his father said nought, having no water, and thinking of the need of all that company that he guided; but Eärendel said again: âTwas good to see Meglin die so, for he would set arms about my motherâand I liked him not; but I would travel in no tunnels for all Melkoâs wolfriders.â Then Tuor smiled and set him upon his shoulders. Soon after this the main company came up, and Tuor gave Eärendel to his mother who was in a great joy; but Eärendel would not be borne in her arms, for he said: âMother Idril, thou art weary, and warriors in mail ride not among the Gondothlim, save it be old Salgant!â and his mother laughed amid her sorrow; but Eärendel said: âNay, where is Salgant?âfor Salgant had told him quaint tales or played drolleries with him at times, and Eärendel had much laughter of the old Gnome in those days when he came many a day to the house of Tuor, loving the good wine and fair repast he there received. But none could say where Salgant was, nor can they now. Mayhap he was whelmed by fire upon his bed; yet some have it that he was taken captive to the halls of Melko and made his buffoonâand this is an ill fate for a noble of the good race of the Gnomes. Then was Eärendel sad at that, and walked beside his mother in silence.

Now came they to the foothills and it was full morning but still grey, and there nigh to the beginning of the upward road folk stretched them and rested in a little dale fringed with trees and with hazel-bushes, and many slept despite their peril, for they were utterly spent. Yet Tuor set a strict watch, and himself slept not. Here they made one meal of scanty food and broken meats; and Eärendel quenched his thirst and played beside a little brook. Then said he to his mother: âMother Idril, I would we had good Ecthelion of the Fountain here to play to me on his flute, or make me willow-whistles! Perchance he has gone on ahead?â But Idril said nay, and told what she had heard of his end. Then said Eärendel that he cared not ever to see the streets of Gondolin again, and he wept bitterly; but Tuor said that he would not again see those streets, âfor Gondolin is no moreâ.

Thereafter nigh to the hour of sundown behind the hills Tuor bade the company arise, and they pressed on by rugged paths. Soon now the grass faded and gave way to mossy stones, and trees fell away, and even the pines and firs grew sparse. About the set of the sun the way so wound behind a shoulder of the hills that they might not again look toward Gondolin. There all that company turned, and lo! the plain is clear and smiling in the last light as of old; but afar off as they gazed a great flare shot up against the darkened northâ and that was the fall of the last tower of Gondolin, even that which had stood hard by the southern gate, and whose shadow fell oft across the walls of Tuorâs house. Then sank the sun, and they saw Gondolin no more.

Now the pass of Cristhorn, that is the Eaglesâ Cleft, is one of dangerous going, and that host had not ventured it by dark, lanternless and without torches, and very weary and cumbered with women and children and sick and stricken men, had it not been for their great fear of Melkoâs scouts, for it was a great company and might not fare very secretly. Darkness gathered rapidly as they approached that high place, and they must string out into a long and straggling line. Galdor and a band of men spear-armed went ahead, and Legolas was with them, whose eyes were like catsâ for the dark, yet could they see further.

Thereafter followed the least weary of the women supporting the sick and the wounded that could go on foot. Idril was with these, and Eârendel who bore up well, but Tuor was in the midmost behind them with all his men of the Wing, and they bore some who were grievously hurt, and Egalmoth was with him, but he had got a hurt in that sally from the square. Behind again came many women with babes, and girls, and lamed men, yet was the going slow enough for them. At the rearmost went the largest band of men battle-whole, and there was Glorfindel of the golden hair.

Thus were they come to Cristhorn, which is an ill place by reason of its height, for this is so great that spring nor summer come ever there, and it is very cold. Indeed while the valley dances in the sun, there all the year snow dwells in those bleak places, and even as they came there the wind howled, coming from the north behind them, and it bit sorely. Snow fell and whirled in wind-eddies and got into their eyes, and this was not good, for there the path is narrow, and of the right or westerly hand a sheer wall rises nigh seven chains from the way, ere it bursts atop into jagged pinnacles where are many eyries. There dwells Thorndor King of Eagles, Lord of the Thornhoth, whom the Eldar named Sorontur. But of the other hand is a fall not right sheer yet dreadly steep, and it has long teeth of rock up-pointing so that one may climb downânor fall maybeâbut by no means up. And from that deep is no escape at either end any more than by the sides, and Thorn Sir runs at bottom. He falls therein from the south over a great precipice but with a slender water, for he is a thin stream in those heights, and he issues to the north after flowing but a rocky mile above ground down a narrow passage that goes into the mountain, and scarce a fish could squeeze through with him.

Galdor and his men were come now to the end nigh to where Thorn Sir falls into the abyss, and the others straggled, for all Tuorâs efforts, back over most of the mile of the perilous way between chasm and cliff, so that Glorfindelâs folk were scarce come to its beginning, when there was a yell in the night that echoed in that grim region. Behold, Galdorâs men were beset in the dark suddenly by shapes leaping from behind rocks where they had lain hidden even from the glance of Legolas. It was Tuorâs thought that they had fallen in with one of Melkoâs ranging companies, and he feared no more than a sharp brush in the dark, yet he sent the women and sick around him rearward and joined his men to Galdorâs, and there was an affray upon the perilous path. But now rocks fell from above, and things looked ill, for they did grievous hurt; but matters seemed to Tuor yet worse when the noise of arms came from the rear, and tidings were said to him by a man of the Swallow that Glorfindel was ill bested by men from behind, and that a Balrog was with them.

Then was he sore afraid of a trap, and this was even what had in truth befallen; for watchers had been set by Melko all about the encircling hills. Yet so many did the valour of the Gondothlim draw off to the assault ere the city could be taken that these were but thinly spread, and were at the least here in the south. Nonetheless one of these had espied the company as they started the upward going from the dale of hazels, and as many bands were got together against them as might be, and devised to fall upon the exiles to front and rear even upon the perilous way of Cristhorn. Now Galdor and Glorfindel held their own despite the surprise of assault, and many of the Orcs were struck into the abyss; but the falling of the rocks was like to end all their valour, and the flight from Gondolin to come to ruin. The moon about that hour rose above the pass, and the gloom somewhat lifted, for his pale light filtered into dark places; yet it lit not the path for the height of the walls. Then arose Thorndor, King of Eagles, and he loved not Melko, for Melko had caught many of his kindred and chained them against sharp rocks to squeeze from them the magic words whereby he might learn to fly (for he dreamed of contending even against Manwë in the air); and when they would not tell he cut off their wings and sought to fashion therefrom a mighty pair for his use, but it availed not.

Now when the clamour from the pass rose to his great eyrie he said: "Wherefore are these foul things, these Orcs of the hills, climbed near to my throne; and why do the sons of the Noldoli cry out in the low places for fear of the children of Melko the accursed? Arise O Thornhoth, whose beaks are of steel and whose talons swords!"

Thereupon there was a rushing like a great wind in rocky places, and the Thornhoth, the people of the Eagles, fell on those Orcs who had scaled above the path, and tore their faces and their hands and flung them to the rocks of Thorn Sir far below. Then were the Gondothlim glad, and they made in after days the Eagle a sign of their kindred in token of their joy, and Idril bore it, but Eärendel loved rather the Swan-wing of his father. Now unhampered Galdor's men bore back those that opposed them, for they were not very many and the onset of the Thornhoth affrighted them much; and the company fared forward again, though Glorfindel had fighting enough in the rear. Already the half had passed the perilous way and the falls of Thorn Sir, when that Balrog that was with the rearward foe leapt with great might on certain lofty rocks that stood into the path on the left side upon the lip of the chasm, and thence with a leap of fury he was past Glorfindel's men and among the women and the sick in front, lashing with his whip of flame. Then Glorfindel leapt forward upon him and his golden armour gleamed strangely in the moon, and he hewed at that demon that it leapt again upon a great boulder and Glorfindel after. Now there was a deadly combat upon that high rock above the folk; and these, pressed behind and hindered ahead, were grown so close that well nigh all could see, yet was it over ere Glorfindel's men could leap to his side. The ardour of Glorfindel drove that Balrog from point to point, and his mail fended him from its whip and claw. Now had he beaten a heavy swinge upon its iron helm, now hewn off the creature's whip-arm at the elbow. Then sprang the Balrog in the torment of his pain and fear full at Glorfindel, who stabbed like a dart of a snake; but he found only a shoulder, and was grappled, and they swayed to a fall upon the crag-top. Then Glorfindel's left hand sought a dirk, and this he thrust up that it pierced the Balrog's belly nigh his own face (for that demon was double his stature); and it shrieked, and fell backwards from the rock, and falling clutched Glorfindel's yellow locks beneath his cap, and those twain fell into the abyss.

Now was this a very grievous thing, for Glorfindel was most dearly beloved—and lo! the dint of their fall echoed about the hills, and the abyss of Thorn Sir rang. Then at the death-cry of the Balrog the Orcs before and behind wavered and were slain or fled far away, and Thorndor himself, a mighty bird, descended to the abyss and brought up the body of Glorfindel; but the Balrog lay, and the water of Thorn Sir ran black for many a day far below in Tumladin.

Still do the Eldar say when they see good fighting at great odds of power against a fury of evil: "Alas! 'Tis Glorfindel and the Balrog, and their hearts are still sore for that fair one of the Noldoli. Because of their love, despite the haste and their fear of the advent of new foes, Tuor let raise a great stone-cairn over Glorfindel just there beyond the perilous way by the precipice of Eagle-stream, and Thorndor has let not yet any harm come thereto, but yellow flowers have fared thither and blow ever now about that mound in those unkindly places; but the folk of the Golden Flower wept at its building and might not dry their tears.

Â

Now who shall tell of the wanderings of Tuor and the exiles of Gondolin in the wastes that lie beyond the mountains to the south of the vale of Tumladin? Miseries were theirs and death, colds and hungers, and ceaseless watches. That they won ever through those regions infested by Melko's evil came from the great slaughter and damage done to his power in that assault, and from the speed and wariness with which Tuor led them; for of a certain Melko knew of that escape and was furious thereat.

Ulmo had heard tidings in the far oceans of the deeds that were done, but he could not yet aid them for they were far from waters and riversâand indeed they thirsted sorely, and they knew not the way.

But after a year and more of wandering, in which many a time they journeyed long tangled in the magic of those wastes only to come again upon their own tracks, once more the summer came, and nigh to its height³⁷ they came at last upon a stream, and following this came to better lands and were a little comforted. Here did VoronwÃ« guide them, for he had caught a whisper of Ulmoâs in that stream one late summerâs nightâand he got ever much wisdom from the sound of waters. Now he led them even till they came down to Sirion which that stream fed, and then both Tuor and VoronwÃ« saw that they were not far from the outer issue of old of the Way of Escape, and were once more in that deep dale of alders. Here were all the bushes trampled and the trees burnt, and the dale-wall scarred with flame, and they wept, for they thought they knew the fate of those who Sundered aforetime from them at the tunnel-mouth.

Now they journeyed down that river but were again in fear from Melko, and fought affrays with his Orc-bands and were in peril from the wolfriders, but his firedrakes sought not at them, both for the great exhaustion of their fires in the taking of Gondolin, and the increasing power of Ulmo as the river grew. So came they after many daysâfor they went slowly and got their sustenance very hardlyâto those great heaths and morasses above the Land of Willows, and VoronwÃ« knew not those regions. Now here goes Sirion a very great way under earth, diving at the great cavern of the Tumultuous Winds, but running clear again above the Pools of Twilight, even where Tulkas³⁸ after fought with Melkoâs self. Tuor had fared over these regions by night and dusk after Ulmo came to him amid the reeds, and he remembered not the ways. In places that land is full of deceits and very marshy; and here the host had long delay and was vexed by sore flies, for it was autumn still, and agues and fevers fared amongst them, and they cursed Melko.

Yet came they at last to the great pools and the edges of that most tender Land of Willows; and the very breath of the winds thereof brought rest and peace to them, and for the comfort of that place the grief was assuaged of those who mourned the dead in that great fall. There women and maids grew fair again and their sick were healed, and old wounds ceased to pain; yet they alone who of reason feared their folk living still in bitter thralldom in the Hells of Iron sang not, nor did they smile.

Here they abode very long indeed, and Eärendel was a grown boy ere the voice of Ulmoâs conches drew the heart of Tuor, that his sea-longing returned with a thirst the deeper for years of stifling; and all that host arose at his bidding, and got them down Sirion to the Sea.

Now the folk that had passed into the Eaglesâ Cleft and who saw the fall of Glorfindel had been nigh eight hundredsâ a large wayfaring, yet was it a sad remnant of so fair and numerous a city. But they who arose from the grasses of the Land of Willows in years after and fared away to sea, when spring set celandine in the meads and they had held sad festival in memorial of Glorfindel, these numbered but three hundreds and a score of men and man-children, and two hundreds and three score of women and maid-children. Now the number of women was few because of their hiding or being stowed by their kinsfolk in secret places in the city. There they were burned or slain or taken and enthralled, and the rescue-parties found them too seldom; and it is the greatest ruth to think of this, for the maids and women of the Gondothlim were as fair as the sun and as lovely as the moon and brighter than the stars. Glory dwelt in that city of Gondolin of the Seven Names, and its ruin was the most dread of all the sacks of cities upon the face of Earth. Nor Bablon, nor Ninwi, nor the towers of Trui, nor all the many takings of Râmm that is greatest among Men, saw such terror as fell that day upon Amon Gwareth in the kindred of the Gnomes; and this is esteemed the worst work that Melko has yet thought of in the world.

Yet now those exiles of Gondolin dwelt at the mouth of Sirion by the waves of the Great Sea. There they take the name of Lothlim, the people of the flower, for Gondothlim is a name too sore to their hearts; and fair among the Lothlim Eärendel grows in the house of his father,³⁹ and the great tale of Tuor is come to its waning.â

Then said Littleheart son of Bronweg: âAlas for Gondolin.â

And no one in all the Room of Logs spake or moved for a great while.

NOTES

- 1 Not of course the great journey to the Sea from the Waters of Awakening, but the expedition of the Elves of KÃ´r for the rescue of the Gnomes (see I. 26).
- 2 A korin is defined in The Cottage of Lost Play (I.16) as âa great circular hedge, be it of stone or of thorn or even of trees, that encloses a green swardâ Meril-i-Turingi dwelt âin a great korin of elmsâ.
- 3 TÃ´n a Gwedrin is the Tale-fire.
- 4 There is here a direction: âsee hereafter the Nauglafringâ, but this is struck out.
- 5 On Heorrenda see pp. 290, 323. A small space is left after the words âit is thusâ to mark the place of the poem in Old English that was to be inserted, but there is no indication of what it was to be.

(In the following notes âthe original readingâ refers to the text of Tuor A, and of Tuor B before the emendation in question. It does not imply that the reading of Tuor A was, or was not, found in the original pencilled text (in the great majority of cases this cannot be said).)

- 6 This passage, beginning with the words âAnd Tuor entered that cavernâ on p. 149, is a late replacement written on a slip (see p. 147). The original passage was largely similar in meaning, but contained the following:

Now in delving that riverway beneath the hills the Noldoli worked unknown to Melko who in those deep days held them yet hidden and thralls beneath his will. Rather were they prompted by Ulmo who strove ever against Melko; and through Tuor he hoped to devise for the Gnomes release from the terror of the evil of Melko.

- 7 âthree daysâ: âthree yearsâ all texts, but âdaysâ pencilled above âyearsâ in Tuor B.
- 8 The âevolutionâ of sea-birds through OssÃ« is described in the tale of The Coming of the Elves, I.123; but the sentence here derives from the original pencilled text of Tuor A.

9 In the typescript Tuor C a blank was left here (see p. 147) and subsequently filled in with âUlmoâ, not âAinurâ.

10 The original reading was: âThou Tuor of the lonely heart the Valar will not to dwell for ever in fair places of birds and flowers; nor would they lead thee through this pleasant landâ|â

11 Tuor C adds here: âwith Ulmoâs aidâ.

12 The reference to the Battle of Unnumbered Tears is a later addition to Tuor B. The original reading was: âwho alone escaped Melkoâs power when he caught their folkâ|â

13 In Tuor A and B VoronwÃ« is used throughout, but this phrase, with the form Bronweg, is an addition to Tuor B (replacing the original âNow after many days these twain found a deep daleâ).

14 The typescript Tuor C has here:

â|that none, were they not of the blood of the Noldoli, might light on it, neither by chance nor agelong search. Thus was it secure from all ill hap save treachery alone, and never would TÃ«r have won thereto but for the steadfastness of that Gnome VoronwÃ«.

In the next sentence Tuor C has âyet even so no few of the bolder of the Gnomes enthralled would slip down the river Sirion from the fell mountainsâ.

15 The original reading was: âhis speech they comprehended, though somewhat different was the tongue of the free Noldoli by those days to that of the sad thralls of Melko.â The typescript Tuor C has: âthey comprehended him for they were Noldoli. Then spake TÃ«r also in the same tongueâ|â

16 The original reading was: âIt was early morn when they drew near the gates and many eyes gazedâ|â But when Tuor and VoronwÃ« first saw Gondolin it was âin the new light of the morningâ (p. 158), and it was âa dayâs light marchâ across the plain; hence the change made later to Tuor B.

17 âEvil Oneâ: original reading âAinuâ.

18 This passage, from âRugged was his aspectâ|â, is a replacement on a separate slip; the original text was:

Tuor was goodly in countenance but rugged and unkempt of locks and clad in the skins of bears, yet his stature was not overgreat among his own folk, but the Gondothlim, though not bent as were no few of their kin who laboured at ceaseless delving and hammering for Melko, were small and slender and lithe.

In the original passage Men are declared to be of their nature taller than the Elves of Gondolin. See pp. 142, p. 220.

19 âcome hitherâ: âescaped from Melkoâ Tuor C.

20 âfolkâ: original reading âmenâ. This is the only place where âmenâ in reference to Elves is changed. The use is constant in The Fall of Gondolin, and even occurs once in an odd-sounding reference to the hosts of Melko: âBut now the men of Melko have assembled their forcesâ (p. 183).

21 The passage ending here and beginning with the words âThen Tuorâs heart was heavyâ|â on p. 162 was bracketed by my father in Tuor B, and on a loose slip referring to this bracketed passage he wrote:

(If nec[essary]): Then is told how Idril daughter of the king added her words to the kingâs wisdom so that Turgon bid Tuor rest himself awhile in Gondolin, and being forewise prevailed on him [to] abide there in the end. How he came to love the daughter of the king, Idril of the Silver Feet, and how he was taught deeply in the lore of that great folk and learned of its history and the history of the Elves. How Tuor grew in wisdom and mighty in the counsels of the Gondothlim.

The only narrative difference here from the actual text lies in the introduction of the king's daughter Idril as an influence on Tuor's decision to remain in Gondolin. The passage is otherwise an extremely abbreviated summary of the account of Tuor's instruction in Gondolin, with omission of what is said in the text about the preparations of the Gondothlim against attack; but I do not think that this was a proposal for shortening the written tale. Rather, the words "if necessary" suggest strongly that my father had in mind only a reduction for oral delivery—and that was when it was read to the Exeter College Essay Club in the spring of 1920; see p. 147. Another proposed shortening is given in note 32.

22 This passage, beginning "Great love too had Idril for Tuor", was written on a separate slip and replaced the original text as follows:

The king hearing of this, and finding that his child Idril, whom the Eldar speak of as Irildë, loved Tuor in return, he consented to their being wed, seeing that he had no son, and Tuor was like to make a kinsman of strength and consolation. There were Idril and Tuor wed before the folk in that Place of the Gods, Gar Ainion, nigh the king's palace; and that was a day of mirth to the city of Gondolin, but of (&c.)

The replacement states that the marriage of Tuor and Idril was the first but not the last of the unions of Man and Elf, whereas it is said in the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin that Eärendel was "the only being that is half of the kindred of the Eldar" and half of Men" (see p. 215).

23 The phrase "and that tale of Isfin and Eärl may not here be told" was added to Tuor B. See p. 220.

24 Original reading: "a name wrought of the tongue of the Gondothlim".

25 The sapphires given to Manwë by the Noldoli are referred to in the tale of The Coming of the Elves, I.128. The original pencilled text of Tuor A can be read here: "bluer than the sapphires of Sâlimo".

26 The passage ending here and beginning with "In these ways that bitter winter passedâ|âis inserted on a separate sheet in Tuor B (but is not part of the latest layer of emendation); it replaces a much shorter passage going back to the primary text of Tuor A:

Now on midwinterâs day at early even the sun sank betimes beyond the mountains, and lo! when she had gone a light arose beyond the hills to the north, and men marvelled (&c.)

See notes 34 and 37.

- 27 The Scarlet Heart: the heart of Finwë Nâlem, Turgonâs father, was cut out by Orcs in the Battle of Unnumbered Tears, but it was regained by Turgon and became his emblem; see I. 241 and note 11.
- 28 This passage describing the array and the emblems of the houses of the Gondothlim was relatively very little affected by the later revision of Tuor A; the greater part of it is in the original pencilled text, which was allowed to stand, and all the names appear to be original.
- 29 The word âburgâ is used in the Old English sense of a walled and fortified town.
- 30 The death of Ecthelion in the primary text of Tuor A is legible; the revision introduced a few changes of wording, but no more.
- 31 This sentence, from âand men shudderedâ, was added to Tuor B. On the prophecy see I.172.
- 32 Tuor B is bracketed from âNow comes Tuor at their head to the Place of Weddingâ on p. 186 to this point, and an inserted slip relating to this bracketing reads:

How Tuor and his folk came upon Idril wandering distraught in the Place of the Gods. How Tuor and Idril from that high place saw the sack of the Kingâs Hall and the ruin of the Kingâs Tower and the passing of the king, for which reason the foe followed not after. How Tuor heard tidings of Voronwë that Idril had sent Eârendel and her guard down the hidden way, and fared into the city in search of her husband; how in peril from the enemy they had rescued many that fled and sent them down the secret way. How Tuor led his host with the luck of the Gods to the mouth of that passage, and how all descended into the plain, sealing the entrance utterly behind them. How the sorrowful company issued into a dell in the vale of Tumladin.

This is simply a summary of the text as it stands; I suppose it was a cut proposed for the recitation of the tale if that seemed to be taking too long (see note 21).

33 This passage, from Here were gathered, replaced in Tuor B the original reading: Here they are fain to rest, but finding no signs of Eärendel and his escort Tuor is downcast, and Idril weeps. This was rewritten partly for narrative reasons, but also to put it into the past tense. In the next sentence the text was emended from Lamentation is there and about them looms But the sentence following (Fire-drakes are about it) was left untouched; and I think that it was my father's intention, only casually indicated and never carried through, to reduce the amount of historical present in the narrative.

34 for summer is at hand: the original reading was albeit it is winter. See notes 26 and 37.

35 The original reading was:

Now the Mountains were on that side seven leagues save a mile from Gondolin, and Crithorn the Cleft of Eagles another league of upward going from the beginning of the Mountains; wherefore they were now yet two leagues and part of a third from the pass, and very weary thereto.

36 Behold, his face shineth as a star in the waste was added to Tuor B.

37 This passage, from But after a year and more of wandering, replaced the original reading But after a half-yearâs wandering, nigh midsummerâ. This emendation depends on the changing of the time of the attack on Gondolin from midwinter to the âGates of Summerâ (see notes 26 and 34). Thus in the revised version summer is retained as the season when the exiles came to the lands about Sirion, but they spent a whole year and more, rather than a half-year, to reach them.

38 âeven where Tulkasâ: original reading: âeven where Noldorin and Tulkasâ. See pp. 278â9.

39 The original pencilled text of Tuor A had âFair among the Lothlim grows EÃrendel in Sornontur the house of Tuorâ. The fourth letter of this name could as well be read as a u.

Changes made to names in The Fall of Gondolin

Ilfiniol < Elfriniol in the first three occurrences of the name in the initial linking passage, Ilfiniol so written at the fourth. Â Â Â Â Â (In The Cottage of Lost Play (I.15) the Gong-warden of Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va is named only Littleheart; in the Link to The Music of the Ainur his Elvish name is Ilverin < Elwenildo (1.46, 52); and in the Link to the Tale of TinÃviel he is Ilfiniol < Elfriniol as here, while the typescript has Ilfrin (p. 7). Â Â Â Â Â In the head-note to the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin he is Elfrith < Elfriniel, and this is the only place where the meaning of the name âLittleheartâ is explained (p. 148); the Name-list has an entry âElf meaneth âheartâ (as Elfin Elben): Elfrith is Littleheartâ (see 1.255, entry Ilverin). In another projected list of names, abandoned after only a couple of entries had been made, we meet again the form Elfrith, and also Elbenil > Elwenil. Â Â Â Â Â This constant changing of name is to be understood in relation to swiftly changing phonological ideas and formulations, but even so is rather extraordinary.)

In the following notes it is to be understood, for brevityâs sake, that names in Tuor B (before emendation) are found in the same form in Tuor A; e.g. âMithrim < Asgon in Tuor Bâ implies that Tuor A has Asgon (unchanged).

Tuor Although sometimes emended to TÃ»r in Tuor B, and invariably written TÃ»r in the typescript Tuor C, I give Tuor throughout; see p. 148.

Dor LÃ³min This name was so written from the first in Tuor B. Tuor A has, at the first three occurrences, Aryador > Mathusdor; at the fourth, Aryador > Mathusdor > Dor LÃ³min.

Mithrim < Asgon throughout Tuor B; Tuor C has Asgon unchanged. Glorfalc or Cris Ilbranteloth (p. 150) Tuor A has Glorfalc or Teld Quing Ilon; Tuor B as written had no Elvish names, Glorfalc or Cris Ilbranteloth being a later addition.

Ainur As in the first draft of The Music of the Ainur (I.61) the original text of Tuor A had Ainu plural.

Falasquil At both occurrences (p. 152) in Tuor A this replaces the original name now illegible but beginning with Q; in Tuor B my mother left blanks and added the name later in pencil; in Tuor C blanks are left in the typescript and not filled in.

Arlisgion This name was added later to Tuor B.

Orcs Tuor A and B had Orqui throughout; my father emended this in Tuor B to Orcs, but not consistently, and in the later part of the tale not at all. In one place only (p. 193, in Thorndorâs speech) both texts have Orcs (also Orc-bands p. 195). As with the name Tuor/TÃ»r I give throughout the form that was to prevail.

At the only occurrence of the singular the word is written with a k in both Tuor A and B (âOrkâs bloodâ, p. 165).

Gar Thurion < Gar Furion in Tuor B (Gar Furion in Tuor C).

Loth < LÃ's in Tuor B (LÃ's in Tuor C).

Lothengriol < LÃ³sengriol in Tuor B (LÃ³sengriol in Tuor C).

Taniquetil At the occurrence on p. 161 there was added in the original text of Tuor A: (Danigwiel), but this was struck out.

KÃr Against this name (p. 161) is pencilled in Tuor B: TÃ»n. See I. 222, II.292.

Gar Ainion < Gar Ainon in Tuor B (p. 164; at the occurrence on p. 186 not emended, but I read Gar Ainion in both places).

Nost-na-Lothion < Nost-na-Lossion in Tuor B.

Duilin At the first occurrence (p. 173) < Duliglin in the original text of Tuor A.

Rog In Tuor A spelt RĀ'g in the earlier occurrences, Rog in the later; in Tuor B spelt RĀ'g throughout but mostly emended later to Rog.

Dramborleg At the occurrence on p. 181 < Drambor in the original text of Tuor A.

Bansil At the occurrence on p. 184 only, Bansil > Banthil in Tuor B.

Cristhorn From the first occurrence on p. 189 written Cristhorn (not Cris Thorn) in Tuor A; Cris Thorn Tuor B throughout.

Bad Uthwen < Bad Uswen in Tuor B. The original reading in Tuor A was (apparently) Bad Usbran.

Sorontur < Ramandur in Tuor B.

Bablon, Ninwi, Trui, RĀ'm The original text of Tuor A had Babylon, Nineveh, Troy, and (probably) Rome. These were changed to the forms given in the text, except Nineveh > NinwĀ«, changed to Ninwi in Tuor B.

Commentary on The Fall of Gondolin

Â§ 1. The primary narrative

As with the Tale of Turambar I break my commentary on this tale into sections. I refer frequently to the much later version (which extends only to the coming of Tuor and VoronwĀ« to sight of Gondolin across the plain) printed in Unfinished Tales pp. 17â51 (âOf Tuor and his Coming to *Gondolin*â); this I shall call here âthe later *Tuor*â.

(i) Tuorâs journey to the Sea and the visitation of Ulmo (pp. 149â56)

In places the later Tuor (the abandonment of which is one of the saddest facts in the whole history of incompleteness) is so close in wording to The Fall of Gondolin, written more than thirty years before, as to make it almost certain that my father had it in front of him, or at least had recently reread it. Striking examples from the late version (pp. 23â4) are: âThe sun rose behind his back and set before his face, and where the water foamed among the boulders or rushed over sudden falls, at morning and evening rainbows were woven across the streamâ Now he said: âIt is a fay-voice,â now: âNay, it is a small beast that is wailing in the wasteâ â[Tuor] wandered still for some days in a rugged country bare of trees; and it was swept by a wind from the sea, and all that grew there, herb or bush, leaned ever to the dawn because of the prevalence of that wind from the Westâwhich are very closely similar to or almost identical with passages in the tale (pp. 150â1). But the differences in the narrative are profound.

Tuorâs origin is left vague in the old story. There is a reference in the Tale of Turambar (p. 88) to âthose kindreds about the waters of Asgon whence after arose Tuor son of Pelegâ, but here it is said that Tuor did not dwell with his people (who âwandered the forests and fellsâ) but âlived alone about that lake called Mithrim [\leq Asgon]â, on which he journeyed in a small boat with a prow made like the neck of a swan. There is indeed scarcely any linking reference to other events, and of course no trace of the Grey-elves of Hithlum who in the later story fostered him, or of his outlawry and hunting by the Easterlings; but there are âwandering Noldoliâ in Dor LÃ³min (HisilÃ³mÃ« \leq , Hithlum)âon whom see p. 65âfrom whom Tuor learnt much, including their tongue, and it was they who guided him down the dark river-passage under the mountains. There is in this a premonition of Gelmir and Arminas, the Noldorin Elves who guided Tuor through the Gate of the Noldor (later Tuor pp. 21â2), and the story that the Noldoli âmade that hidden way at the prompting of Ulmoâ survived in the much richer historical context of the later legend, where âthe Gate of the Noldorâ|was made by the skill of that people, long ago in the days of Turgonâ (later Tuor p. 18).

The later Tuor becomes very close to the old story for a time when Tuor emerges out of the tunnel into the ravine (later called Cirith Ninniach, but still a name of Tuorâs own devising); many features recur, such as the stars shining in the âdark lane of sky above himâ, the echoes of his harping (in the tale of course without the literary echoes of Morgothâs cry and the voices of FÃ«anorâs host that landed there), his doubt concerning the mournful calling of the gulls, the narrowing of the ravine where the incoming tide (fierce because of the west wind) met the water of the river, and Tuorâs escape by climbing to the cliff-top (but in the tale the connection between Tuorâs curiosity concerning the gulls and the saving of his life is not made: he climbed the cliff in response to the prompting of the Ainur). Notable is the retention of the idea that Tuor was the first of Men to reach the Sea, standing on the cliff-top with outspread arms, and of his âsea-longingâ (later Tuor p. 25). But the story of his dwelling in the cove of Falasquil and his adornment of it with carvings (and of course the floating of timber down the river to him by the Noldoli of Dor LÃ³min) was abandoned; in the later legend Tuor finds on the coast ruins of the ancient harbour-works of the Noldor from the days of Turgonâs lordship in Nevrast, and of Turgonâs former dwelling in these regions before he went to Gondolin there is in the old story no trace. Thus the entire Vinyamar episode is absent from it, and despite the frequent reminder that Ulmo was guiding Tuor as the instrument of his designs, the essential element in the later legend of the arms left for him by Turgon on Ulmoâs instruction (The Silmarillion pp. 126, 238â9) is lacking.

The southward-flying swans (seven, not three, in the later Tuor) play essentially the same part in both narratives, drawing Tuor to continue his journey; but the emblem of the Swan was afterwards given a different origin, as âthe token of Annael and his foster-folkâ, the Grey-elves of Mithrim (later Tuor p. 25).

Both in the route taken (for the geography see p. 217) and in the seasons of the year my father afterwards departed largely from the original story of Tuorâs journey to Gondolin. In the later Tuor it was the Fell Winter after the fall of Nargothrond, the winter of TÃ³rinâs return to Hithlum, when he and VoronwÃ« journeyed in snow and bitter cold eastwards beneath the Mountains of Shadow. Here the journey takes far longer: he left Falasquil in âthe latest days of summerâ (as still in the later Tuor) but he went down all the coast of Beleriand to the mouths of Sirion, and it was the summer of the following year when he lingered in the Land of Willows. (Doubtless the geography was less definite than it afterwards became, but its general resemblance to the later map seems assured by the description (p. 153) of the coastâs trending after a time eastwards rather than southwards.)

Only in its place in the narrative structure is there resemblance between Ulmoâs visitation of Tuor in the Land of Willows in a summer twilight and his tremendous epiphany out of the rising storm on the coast at Vinyamar. It is however most remarkable that the old vision of the Land of Willows and its drowsy beauty of river-flowers and butterflies was not lost, though afterwards it was Voronwâ, not Tuor, who wandered there, devising names, and who stood enchanted âknee-deep in the grassâ (p. 155; later Tuor p. 35), until his fate, or Ulmo Lord of Waters, carried him down to the Sea. Possibly there is a faint reminiscence of the old story in Ulmoâs words (later Tuor p. 28): âHaste thou must learn, and the pleasant road that I designed for thee must be changed.â

In the tale, Ulmoâs speech to Tuor (or at least that part of it that is reported) is far more simple and brief, and there is no suggestion there of Ulmoâs âopposing the will of his brethren, the Lords of the Westâ but two essential elements of his later message are present, that Tuor will find the words to speak when he stands before Turgon, and the reference to Tuorâs unborn son (in the later Tuor much less explicit: âBut it is not for thy valour only that I send thee, but to bring into the world a hope beyond thy sight, and a light that shall pierce the darknessâ).

(ii) The journey of Tuor and Voronwâ to Gondolin (pp. 156â8)

Of Tuorâs journey to Gondolin, apart from his sojourn in the Land of Willows, little is told in the tale, and Voronwâ only appears late in its course as the one Noldo who was not too fearful to accompany him further; of Voronwââs history as afterwards related there is no word, and he is not an Elf of Gondolin.

It is notable that the Noldoli who guided Tuor northwards from the Land of Willows call themselves thralls of Melko. On this matter the Tales present a consistent picture. It is said in the Tale of Tinâviel (p. 9) that all the Eldar both those who remained in the dark or who had been lost upon the march from Palisor and those Noldoli too who fared back into the world after [Melko] seeking their stolen treasury fell beneath his power as thralls.

In The Fall of Gondolin it is said that the Noldoli did their service to Ulmo in secret, and out of fear of Melko wavered much (p. 154), and Voronwë spoke to Tuor of the weariness of thralldom (pp. 156-7); Melko sent out his army of spies to search out the dwelling of the Noldoli that had escaped his thralldom (p. 166). These thrall-Noldoli are represented as moving as it were freely about the lands, even to the mouths of Sirion, but they wandered as in a dream of fear, doing [Melko's] ill bidding, for the spell of bottomless dread was on them and they felt the eyes of Melko burn them from afar (Tale of Turambar, p. 77). This expression is often used: Voronwë rejoiced in Gondolin that he no longer dreaded Melko with a binding terror and of a sooth that spell which Melko held over the Noldoli was one of bottomless dread, so that he seemed ever nigh them even were they far from the Hells of Iron, and their hearts quaked and they fled not even when they could (p. 159). The spell of bottomless dread was laid too on Meglin (p. 169).

There is little in all this that cannot be brought more or less into harmony with the later narratives, and indeed one may hear an echo in the words of The Silmarillion (p. 156):

But ever the Noldor feared most the treachery of those of their own kin, who had been thralls in Angband; for Morgoth used some of these for his evil purposes, and feigning to give them liberty sent them abroad, but their wills were chained to his, and they strayed only to come back to him again.

Nonetheless one gains the impression that at that time my father pictured the power of Melko when at its height as operating more diffusedly and intangibly, and perhaps also more universally, in the Great Lands. Whereas in The Silmarillion the Noldor who are not free are prisoners in Angband (whence a few may escape, and others with enslaved wills may be sent out), here all save the Gondothlim are thralls, controlled by Melko from afar, and Melko asserts that the Noldoli are all, by their very existence in the Great Lands, his slaves by right. It is a difference difficult to define, but that there is a difference may be seen in the improbability, for the later story, of Tuor being guided on his way to Gondolin by Noldor who were in any sense slaves of Morgoth.

The entrance to Gondolin has some general similarity to the far fuller and more precisely visualised account in the later Tuor: a deep rivergorge, tangled bushes, a cave-mouthâbut the river is certainly Sirion (see the passage at the end of the tale, p. 195, where the exiles come back to the entrance), and the entrance to the secret way is in one of the steep river banks, quite unlike the description of the Dry River whose ancient bed was itself the secret way (later Tuor pp. 43â4). The long tunnel which Tuor and VoronwÃ« traverse in the tale leads them at length not only to the Guard but also to sunlight, and they are âat the foot of steep hillsâ and can see the city: in other words there is a simple conception of a plain, a ring-wall of mountains, and a tunnel through them leading to the outer world. In the later Tuor the approach to the city is much stranger: for the tunnel of the Guard leads to the ravine of Orfalch Echor, a great rift from top to bottom of the Encircling Mountains (âsheer as if axe-clovenâ, p. 46), up which the road climbed through the successive gates until it came to the Seventh Gate, barring the rift at the top. Only when this last gate was opened and Tuor passed through was he able to see Gondolin; and we must suppose (though the narrative does not reach this point) that the travellers had to descend again from the Seventh Gate in order to reach the plain.

It is notable that Tuor and VoronwÃ« are received by the Guard without any of the suspicion and menace that greeted them in the later story (p. 45).

(iii) Tuor in Gondolin (pp. 159â64)

With this section of the narrative compare The Silmarillion, p. 126:

Behind the circle of the mountains the people of Turgon grew and throve, and they put forth their skill in labour unceasing, so that Gondolin upon Amon Gwareth became fair indeed and fit to compare even with Elven Tirion beyond the sea. High and white were its walls, and smooth its stairs, and tall and strong was the Tower of the King. There shining fountains played, and in the courts of Turgon stood images of the Trees of old, which Turgon himself wrought with elven-craft; and the Tree which he made of gold was named Glingal, and the Tree whose flowers he made of silver was named Belthil.

The image of Gondolin was enduring, and it reappears in the glimpses given in notes for the continuation of the later Tuor (Unfinished Tales p. 56): the stairs up to its high platform, and its great gate the Place of the Fountain, the King's tower on a pillared arcade, the King's house. Indeed the only real difference that emerges from the original account concerns the Trees of Gondolin, which in the former were unfading, shoots of old from the glorious Trees of Valinor, but in The Silmarillion were images made of the precious metals. On the Trees of Gondolin see the entries Bansil and Glingol from the Name-list, given below pp. 214-16. The gift by the Gods of these shoots (which blossomed eternally without abating) to Inwe and Námle at the time of the building of Kôr, each being given a shoot of either Tree, is mentioned in The Coming of the Elves (I.123), and in The Hiding of Valinor there is a reference to the uprooting of those given to Námle, which were gone no one knew whither, and more had there never been (I.213).

But a deep underlying shift in the history of Gondolin separates the earlier and later accounts: for whereas in the Lost Tales (and later) Gondolin was only discovered after the Battle of Unnumbered Tears when the host of Turgon retreated southwards down Sirion, in The Silmarillion it had been found by Turgon of Nevrast more than four hundred years before (442 years before Tuor came to Gondolin in the Fell Winter after the fall of Nargothrond in the year 495 of the Sun). In the tale my father imagined a great age passing between the Battle of Unnumbered Tears and the destruction of the city (unstaying labour through ages of years had not sufficed to its building and adornment whereat folk travailed yet, p. 163); afterwards, with radical changes in the chronology of the First Age after the rising of the Sun and Moon, this period was reduced to no more than (in the last extant version of The Tale of Years of the First Age) thirty-eight years. But the old conception can still be felt in the passage on p. 240 of The Silmarillion describing the withdrawal of the people of Gondolin from all concern with the world outside after the Nirnaeth Arnoediad, with its air of long years passing.*

In The Silmarillion it is explicit that Turgon devised the city to be a memorial of Tirion upon Tana (p. 125), and it became âas beautiful as a memory of Elven Tirionâ (p. 240). This is not said in the old story, and indeed in the Lost Tales Turgon himself had never known KÃ´r (he was born in the Great Lands after the return of the Noldoli from Valinor, I.167, 238, 240); one may feel nonetheless that the tower of the King, the fountains and stairs, the white marbles of Gondolin embody a recollection of KÃ´r as it is described in The Coming of the Elves and the Making of KÃ´r (I.122â3).

I have said above that âdespite the frequent reminder that Ulmo was guiding Tuor as the instrument of his designs, the essential element in the later legend of the arms left for him by Turgon on Ulmoâs instruction is lackingâ. Now however we seem to see the germ of this conception in Turgonâs words to Tuor (p. 161): âThy coming was set in our books of wisdom, and it has been written that there would come to pass many great things in the homes of the Gondothlim whenso thou farest hither.â Yet it is clear from Tuorâs reply that as yet the establishment of Gondolin was no part of Ulmoâs design, since âthere have come to the ears of Ulmo whispers of your dwelling and your hill of vigilance against the evil of Melko, and he is gladâ.

In the tale, Ulmo foresaw that Turgon would be unwilling to take up arms against Melko, and he fell back, through the mouth of Tuor, on a second counsel: that Turgon send Elves from Gondolin down Sirion to the coasts, there to build ships to carry messages to Valinor. To this Turgon replied, decisively and unanswerably, that he had sent messengers down the great river with this very purpose âfor years untoldâ, and since all had been unavailing he would now do so no more. Now this clearly relates to a passage in The Silmarilion (p. 159) where it is said that Turgon, after the Dagor Bragollach and the breaking of the Siege of Angband, sent companies of the Gondolindrim in secret to the mouths of Sirion and the Isle of Balar. There they built ships, and set sail into the uttermost West upon Turgonâs errand, seeking for Valinor, to ask for pardon and aid of the Valar; and they besought the birds of the sea to guide them. But the seas were wild and wide, and shadow and enchantment lay upon them; and Valinor was hidden.

Therefore none of the messengers of Turgon came into the West, and many were lost and few returned.

Turgon did indeed do so once more, after the Battle of Unnumbered Tears (The Silmarillion p. 196), and the only survivor of that last expedition into the West was Voronwë of Gondolin. Thus, despite profound changes in chronology and a great development in the narrative of the last centuries of the First Age, the idea of the desperate attempts of Turgon to get a message through to Valinor goes back to the beginning.

Another aboriginal feature is that Turgon had no son; but (curiously) no mention whatsoever is made in the tale of his wife, the mother of Idril. In The Silmarillion (p. 90) his wife Elenwë was lost in the crossing of the Helcaraxë, but obviously this story belongs to a later period, when Turgon was born in Valinor.

The tale of Tuor's sojourn in Gondolin survived into the brief words of The Silmarillion (p. 241):

And Tuor remained in Gondolin, for its bliss and its beauty and the wisdom of its people held him enthralled; and he became mighty in stature and in mind, and learned deeply of the lore of the exiled Elves.

In the present tale he heard tell of Ilëvatar, the Lord for Always, who dwelleth beyond the world, and of the Music of the Ainur. Knowledge of the very existence of Ilëvatar was, it seems, a prerogative of the Elves; long afterwards in the garden of Mar Vanwa Tyaliëva (I.49) Eriol asked Rëmil: "Who was Ilëvatar? Was he of the Gods?" and Rëmil answered: "Nay, that he was not; for he made them. Ilëvatar is the Lord for Always, who dwells beyond the world."

(iv) The encirclement of Gondolin; the treachery of Meglin (pp. 164-171)

The king's daughter was from the first named Idril of the Silver Feet (Irildë in the language of the Eldar, note 22); Meglin (later Maeglin) was his nephew, though the name of his mother (Turgon's sister) Isfin was later changed.

In this section of the narrative the story in The Silmarillion (pp. 241â2) preserved all the essentials of the original version, with one major exception. The wedding of Tuor and Idril took place with the consent and full favour of the king, and there was great joy in Gondolin among all save Maeglin (whose love of Idril is told earlier in The Silmarillion, p. 139, where the barrier of his being close kin to her, not mentioned in the tale, is emphasised). Idrilâs power of foreseeing and her foreboding of evil to come; the secret way of her devising (but in the tale this led south from the city, and the Eaglesâ Cleft was in the southern mountains); the loss of Meglin in the hills while seeking for ore; his capture by Orcs, his treacherous purchase of life, and his return to Gondolin to avert suspicion (with the detail of his changed mood thereafter and âsmiling faceâ)âall this remained. Much is of course absent (whether rejected or merely passed over) in the succinct account devised for *The Silmarillion*âwhere there is no mention, for example, of Idrilâs dream concerning Meglin, the watch set on him when he went to the hills, the formation on Idrilâs advice of a guard bearing Tuorâs emblem, the refusal of Turgon to doubt the invulnerability of the city and his trust in Meglin, Meglinâs discovery of the secret way,* or the remarkable story that it was Meglin himself who conceived the idea of the monsters of fire and iron and communicated it to Melkoâa valuable defector indeed!

The great difference between the versions lies of course in the nature of Melko/Morgothâs knowledge of Gondolin. In the tale, he had by means of a vast army of spiesâ already discovered it before ever Meglin was captured, and creatures of Melko had found the âWay of Escapeâ and looked down on Gondolin from the surrounding heights. Meglinâs treachery in the old story lay in his giving an exact account of the structure of the city and the preparations made for its defenceâand in his advice to Melko concerning the monsters of flame. In The Silmarillion, on the other hand, there is the element, devised much later, of the unconscious betrayal by Hârin to Morgothâs spies of the general region in which Gondolin must be sought, in âthe mountainous land between Anach and the upper waters of Sirion, whither [Morgothâs] servants had never passedâ (p. 241); but âstill no spy or creature out of Angband could come there because of the vigilance of the eaglesâand of this râle of the eagles of the Encircling Mountains (though hostile to Melko, p. 193) there is in the original story no suggestion.

Thus in The Silmarillion Morgoth remained in ignorance until Maeglinâs capture of the precise location of Gondolin, and Maeglinâs information was of correspondingly greater value to him, as it was also of greater damage to the city. The history of the last years of Gondolin has thus a somewhat different atmosphere in the tale, for the Gondothlim are informed of the fact that Melko has âencompassed the vale of Tumladin aroundâ (p. 167), and Turgon makes preparations for war and strengthens the watch on the hills. The withdrawal of all Melkoâs spies shortly before the attack on Gondolin did indeed bring about a renewal of optimism among the Gondothlim, and in Turgon not least, so that when the attack came the people were unprepared; but in the later story the shock of the sudden assault is much greater, for there has never been any reason to suppose that the city is in immediate danger, and Idrilâs foreboding is peculiar to herself and more mysterious.

(v) The array of the Gondothlim (pp. 171â4)

Though the central image of this part of the storyâthe people of Gondolin looking out from their walls to hail the rising sun on the feast of the Gates of Summer, but seeing a red light rising in the north and not in the eastâsurvived, of all the heraldry in this passage scarcely anything is found in later writings. Doubtless, if my father had continued the later Tuor, much would have re-emerged, however changed, if we judge by the rich âheraldicâ descriptions of the great gates and their guards in the Orfalch Echor (pp. 46â50). But in the concise account in The Silmarillion the only vestiges are the titles Ecthelion âof the Fountainâ* and Glorfindel âchief of the House of the Golden Flower of Gondolinâ. Ecthelion and Glorfindel are named also in The Silmarillion (p. 194) as Turgonâs captains who guarded the flanks of the host of Gondolin in their retreat down Sirion from the Nirnaeth Arnoediad, but of other captains named in the tale there is no mention afterwardsâ although it is significant that the eighteenth Ruling Steward of Gondor was named Egalmoth, as the seventeenth and twenty-fifth were named Ecthelion (The Lord of the Rings, Appendix A (I, ii)).*

Glorfindel of the golden hair (p. 192) remains yellow-haired Glorfindel in The Silmarillion, and this was from the beginning the meaning of his name.

(vi) The battle of Gondolin (pp. 174-188)

Virtually the entire history of the fighting in Gondolin is unique in the tale of The Fall of Gondolin; the whole story is summarised in The Silmarillion (p. 242) in a few lines:

Of the deeds of desperate valour there done, by the chieftains of the noble houses and their warriors, and not least by Tuor, much is told in The Fall of Gondolin: of the battle of Ecthelion of the Fountain with Gothmog Lord of Balrogs in the very square of the King, where each slew the other, and of the defence of the tower of Turgon by the people of his household, until the tower was overthrown: and mighty was its fall and the fall of Turgon in its ruin.

Tuor sought to rescue Idril from the sack of the city, but Maeglin had laid hands on her, and on Eärendil; and Tuor fought with Maeglin on the walls, and cast him far out, and his body as it fell smote the rocky slopes of Amon Gwareth thrice ere it pitched into the flames below. Then Tuor and Idril led such remnants of the people of Gondolin as they could gather in the confusion of the burning down the secret way which Idril had prepared.

(In this highly compressed account the detail that Maeglin's body struck the slopes of Amon Gwareth three times before it pitched into the flames was retained.) It would seem from The Silmarillion account that Maeglin's attempt on Idril and Eärendil took place much later in the fighting, and indeed shortly before the escape of the fugitives down the tunnel; but I think that this is far more likely to be the result of compression than of a change in the narrative of the battle.

In the tale Gondolin is very clearly visualised as a city, with its markets and its great squares, of which there are only vestiges in later writing (see above, p. 207); and there is nothing vague in the description of the fighting. The early conception of the Balrogs makes them less terrible, and certainly more destructible, than they afterwards became: they existed in âhundredsâ (p. 170),* and were slain by Tuor and the Gondothlim in large numbers: thus five fell before Tuorâs great axe Dramborleg, three before Ecthelionâs sword, and two score were slain by the warriors of the kingâs house. The Balrogs are âdemons of powerâ (p. 181); they are capable of pain and fear (p. 194); they are attired in iron armour (pp. 181, 194), and they have whips of flame (a character they never lost) and claws of steel (pp. 169, 179).

In The Silmarillion the dragons that came against Gondolin were âof the brood of Glaurungâ, which âwere become now many and terribleâ whereas in the tale the language employed (p. 170) suggests that some at least of the âMonstersâ were inanimate âdevicesâ, the construction of smiths in the forges of Angband. But even the âthings of ironâ that âopened about their middlesâ to disgorge bands of Orcs are called âruthless beastsâ, and Gothmog âbadeâ them âpile themselvesâ (p. 176); those made of bronze or copper âwere given hearts and spirits of blazing fireâ while the âfire-drakeâ that Tuor hewed screamed and lashed with its tail (p. 181).

A small detail of the narrative is curious: what âmessengersâ did Meglin send to Melko to warn him to guard the outer entrance of the Way of Escape (where he guessed that the secret tunnel must lead in the end)? Whom could Meglin trust sufficiently? And who would dare to go?

(vii) The escape of the fugitives and the battle in Crithorn (pp. 188â95)

The story as told in The Silmarillion (p. 243) is somewhat fuller in its account of the escape of the fugitives from the city and the ambush in the Eaglesâ Cleft (there called Cirith Thoronath) than in that of the assault and sack itself, but only in one point are the two narratives actually at varianceâas already noticed, the Eaglesâ Cleft was afterwards moved from the southern parts of the Encircling Mountains to the northern, and Idrilâs tunnel led north from the city (the comment is made that it was not thought âthat any fugitives would take a path towards the north and the highest parts of the mountains and the nighest to Angbandâ). The tale provides a richness of detail and an immediacy that is lacking in the short version, where such things as the tripping over dead bodies in the hot and reeking underground passage have disappeared; and there is no mention of the Gondothlim who against the counsel of Idril and Tuor went to the Way of Escape and were there destroyed by the dragon lying in wait, or of the fight to rescue Eärendel.

In the tale appears the keen-sighted Elf Legolas Greenleaf, first of the names of the Fellowship of the Ring to appear in my father's writings (see p. 217 on this earlier Legolas), followed by Gimli (an Elf) in the Tale of Tinviel.

In one point the story of the ambush in Crithorn seems difficult to follow: this is the statement on p. 193 that the moon lit not the path for the height of the walls. The fugitives were moving southwards through the Encircling Mountains, and the sheer rockwall above the path in the Eagles' Cleft was of the right or westerly hand, while on the left there was a fall dreadly steep. Surely then the moon rising in the east would illuminate the path?

The name Crithorn appears in my father's drawing of Gondolin and the Vale of Tumladen from Crithorn, September 1928 (Pictures by J. R. R. Tolkien, 1979, no. 35).

(viii) The wanderings of the Exiles of Gondolin (pp. 195-7)

In The Silmarillion (p. 243) it is said that led by Tuor son of Huor the remnant of Gondolin passed over the mountains, and came down into the Vale of Sirion. One would suppose that they came down into Dimbar, and so fleeing southward by weary and dangerous marches they came at length to Nantathren, the Land of Willows. It seems strange in the tale that the exiles were wandering in the wilderness for more than a year, and yet achieved only to the outer entrance of the Way of Escape; but the geography of this region may have been vaguer when The Fall of Gondolin was written.

In The Silmarillion when Tuor and Idril went down from Nantathren to the mouths of Sirion they joined their people to the company of Elwing, Dior's daughter, that had fled thither but a little while before. Of this there is no mention here; but I postpone consideration of this part of the narrative.

Â§ 2 Entries in the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin

On this list see p. 148, where the head-note to it is given. Specifically linguistic information from the list, including meanings, is incorporated in the Appendix on Names, but I collect here some statements of other kind (arranged in alphabetical order) that are contained in it.

Bablon âwas a city of Men, and more rightly Babylon, but such is the Gnomesâ name as they now shape it, and they got it from Men aforetime.â

Bansil âNow this name had the Gondothlim for that tree before their kingâs door which bore silver blossom and faded notâand its name had Elfriniel from his father VoronwÃ« and it meaneth âFairgleamâ. Now that tree of which it was a shoot (brought in the deep ages out of Valinor by the Noldoli) had like properties, but greater, seeing that for half the twenty-four hours it lit all Valinor with silver light. This the Eldar still tell of as Silpion or âCherrymoonâ, for its blossom was like that of a cherry in springâbut of that tree in Gondolin they know no name, and the Noldoli tell of it alone.â

Dor LÃ³min âor the âLand of Shadowsâ was that region named of the Eldar HisilÃ³mÃ« (and this means Shadowy Twilights) where Melko shut Men, and it is so called by reason of the scanty sun which peeps little over the Iron Mountains to the east and south of itâthere dwell now the Shadow Folk. Thence came Tuor to Gondolin.â

EÃ«rendel âwas the son of Tuor and Idril and âtis said the only being that is half of the kindred of the EldaliÃ« and half of Men. He was the greatest and first of all mariners among Men, and saw regions that Men have not yet found nor gazed upon for all the multitude of their boats. He rideth now with VoronwÃ« upon the winds of the firmament nor comes ever further back than KÃ«r, else would he die like other Men, so much of the mortal is in him.â

(For these last statements about EÃ«rendel see pp. 264â5. The statement that EÃ«rendel was âthe only being that is half of the kindred of the EldaliÃ« and half of Menâ is very notable. Presumably this was written when Beren was an Elf, not a Man (see p. 139); Dior son of Beren and TinÃºviel appears in the Tale of the Nauglafring, but there Beren is an Elf, and Dior is not Half-elven. In the tale of The Fall of Gondolin itself it is said, but in a later replacement passage (p. 164 and note 22), that Tuor was the first but not the last to wed âa daughter of Elfinesseâ. On the extraordinary statement in the Tale of Turambar that Tamar Lamfoot was Half-elven see p. 130.)

Ecthelion âwas that lord of the house of the Fountain, who had the fairest voice and was most skilled in musics of all the Gondothlim. He won renown for ever by his slaying of Gothmog son of Melko, whereby Tuor was saved from death but Ecthelion was drowned with his foe in the kingâs fountain.â

Egalmoth was âlord of the house of the Heavenly Arch, and got even out of the burning of Gondolin, and dwelt after at the mouth of Sirion, but was slain in a dire battle there when Melko seized Elwingâ.

(See p. 258.)

Galdor âwas that valiant Gnome who led the men of the Tree in many a charge and yet won out of Gondolin and even the onslaught of Melko upon the dwellers at Sirionâs mouth and went back to the ruins with EÃºrendel. He dwelleth yet in Tol EressÃ«a (said Elfriniel), and still do some of his folk name themselves Nos Galdon, for Galdon is a tree, and thereto Galdorâs name akin.â The last phrase was emended to read: â*Nos nan Alwen*, for Alwen is a Tree.â

(For Galdorâs return to the ruins of Gondolin with EÃºrendel see p. 258.)

Glingol âmeaneth âsinging-goldâ (âtis said), and this name was that which the Gondothlim had for that other of the two unfading trees in the kingâs square which bore golden bloom. It also was a shoot from the trees of Valinor (see rather where Elfrith has spoken of Bansil), but of LindeloktÃ« (which is âsinging-clusterâ) or Laurelin [emended from LindelaurÃ«] (which is âsinging-goldâ) which lit all Valinor with golden light for half the 24 hours.â

(For the name LindeloktÃ« see I.22, 258 (entry Lindelos).)

Glorfindel âled the Golden Flower and was the best beloved of the Gondothlim, save it be Ecthelion, but who shall choose. Yet he was hapless and fell slaying a Balrog in the great fight in Crithorn. His name meaneth Goldtress for his hair was golden, and the name of his house in Noldorissa Losâl³riolâ (emended from Los Gl³riol).

Gondolin âmeaneth stone of song (whereby figuratively the Gnomes meant stone that was carven and wrought to great beauty), and this was the name most usual of the Seven Names they gave to their city of secret refuge from Melko in those days before the release.â

Gothmog âwas a son of Melko and the ogress Fluithuin and his name is Strife-and-hatred, and he was Captain of the Balrogs and lord of Melkoâs hosts ere fair Ecthelion slew him at the taking of Gondolin. The Eldar named him Kosmoko or Kosomok(o), but âtis a name that fitteth their tongue no way and has an ill sound even in our own rougher speech, said Elfrith [emended from Elfriniel].â

(In a list of names of the Valar associated with the tale of The Coming of the Valar (I.93) it is said that Melko had a son âby Ulbandiâ called Kosomot; the early âQenyaâ dictionary gives Kosomoko = Gnomish Gothmog, I.258. In the tale Gothmog is called the âmarshalâ of the hosts of Melko (p. 184).)

In the later development of the legends Gothmog was the slayer of F³ânor, and in the Battle of Unnumbered Tears it was he who slew Fingon and captured H³ârin (The Silmarillion pp. 107, 193, 195). He is not of course called later âson of Melkorâ the âChildren of the Valarâ was a feature of the earlier mythology that my father discarded.

In the Third Age Gothmog was the name of the lieutenant of Minas Morgul (The Return of the King V.6).)

Hendor âwas a house-carle of Idrilâs and was aged, but bore E³ârendel down the secret passage.â

Idril âwas that most fair daughter of the king of Gondolin whom Tuor loved when she was but a little maid, and who bare him E³ârendel. Her the Elves name Irild³â; and we speak of as Idril Tal-Celeb or Idril of the Silver Feet, but they Irild³â Taltelepta.â

See the Appendix on Names, entry Idril.

Indor was the name of the father of Tuor's father, wherefore did the Gnomes name Eärendel Gon Indor and the Elves Indorildo or Indorion.

Legolas was Green-leaf was a man of the Tree, who led the exiles over Tumladen in the dark, being night-sighted, and he liveth still in Tol Eressëa named by the Eldar there Laiqalassë; but the book of Rómil saith further hereon.
(See I.267, entry Tári-Laisi.)

§ 3 Miscellaneous Matters

(i) The geography of The Fall of Gondolin

I have noticed above (p. 205) that in Tuor's journey all along the coast of what was afterwards Beleriand to the mouths of Sirion there is an unquestionable resemblance to the later map, in the trend of the coast from north-south to east-west. It is also said that after he left Falasquith the distant hills marched ever nearer to the margin of the sea, and that the spurs of the Iron Mountains run even to the sea (pp. 152-3). These statements can likewise be readily enough related to the map, where the long western extension of the Mountains of Shadow (Ered Wethrin), forming the southern border of Nevrast, reached the sea at Vinyamar (for the equation of the Mountains of Iron and the Mountains of Shadow see I. 111-12).

Arlisgion, the place of reeds (p. 153) above the mouths of Sirion, survived in Lisgardh the land of reeds at the Mouths of Sirion in the later Tuor (p. 34); and the feature that the great river passed underground for a part of its course goes back to the earliest period, as does that of the Meres of Twilight, Aelin-uial (the Pools of Twilight, p. 195). There is here however a substantial difference in the tale from The Silmarillion (p. 122), where Aelin-uial was the region of great pools and marshes where the flood of Sirion was stayed south of the Meres the river fell from the north in a mighty fall and then he plunged suddenly underground into great tunnels that the weight of his falling waters delved. Here on the other hand the Pools of Twilight are clearly below the cavern of the Tumultuous Winds (never mentioned later) where Sirion dives underground. But the Land of Willows, below the region of Sirionâs underground passage, is placed as it was to remain.

Thus the view I expressed (p. 141) of the geographical indications in the Tale of Turambar can be asserted also of those of The Fall of Gondolin.

(ii) Ulmo and the other Valar in The Fall of Gondolin

In the speech of Tuor inspired by Ulmo that he uttered at his first meeting with Turgon (p. 161) he said: âthe hearts of the Valar are angeredâ|seeing the sorrow of the thralldom of the Noldoli and the wanderings of Men.â This is greatly at variance with what is told in The Hiding of Valinor, especially the following (I.208â9):*

The most of the Valar moreover were fain of their ancient ease and desired only peace, wishing neither rumour of Melko and his violence nor murmur of the restless Gnomes to come ever again among them to disturb their happiness; and for such reasons they also clamoured for the concealment of the land. Not the least among these were VÃjna and Nessa, albeit most even of the great Gods were of one mind. In vain did Ulmo of his foreknowing plead before them for pity and pardon on the Noldoliâ|

Subsequently Tuor said (p. 161): âthe Gods sit in Valinor, though their mirth is minished for sorrow and fear of Melko, and they hide their land and weave about it inaccessible magic that no evil come to its shores.â Turgon in his reply ironically echoed and altered the words: âthey that sit within [i.e. in Valinor] reckon little of the dread of Melko or the sorrow of the world, but hide their land and weave about it inaccessible magic, that no tidings of evil come ever to their ears.â

How is this to be understood? Was this Ulmoâs âdiplomacyâ? Certainly Turgonâs understanding of the motives of the Valar chimes better with what is said of them in The Hiding of Valinor.

But the Gnomes of Gondolin revered the Valar. There were âpomps of the Ainurâ (p. 165); a great square of the city and its highest point was Gar Ainion, the Place of the Gods, where weddings were celebrated (pp. 164, 186); and the people of the Hammer of Wrath âreverenced AulÃ« the Smith more than all other Ainurâ (p. 174).

Â

Of particular interest is the passage (p. 165) in which a reason is given for Ulmo's choice of a Man as the agent of his designs: "Now Melko was not much afraid of the race of Men in those days of his great power, and for this reason did Ulmo work through one of this kindred for the better deceiving of Melko, seeing that no Valar and scarce any of the Eldar or Noldoli might stir unmarked of his vigilance." This is the only place where a reason is expressly offered, save for an isolated early note, where two reasons are given:

- (1) "the wrath of the Gods" (i.e. against the Gnomes);
- (2) "Melko did not fear Men" had he thought that any messengers were getting to Valinor he would have redoubled his vigilance and evil and hidden the Gnomes away utterly."

But this is too oblique to be helpful.

Â

The conception of "the luck of the Gods" occurs again in this tale (pp. 188, 200 note 32), as it does in the Tale of Turambar: see p. 141. The Ainur "put it into Tuor's heart" to climb the cliff out of the ravine of Golden Cleft for the saving of his life (p. 151).

Â

Very strange is the passage concerning the birth of Eärendel (p. 165): "In these days came to pass the fulfilment of the time of the desire of the Valar and the hope of the Eldali", for in great love Idril bore to Tuor a son and he was called Eärendel. "Is it to be understood that the union of Elf and mortal Man, and the birth of their offspring, was "the desire of the Valar" that the Valar foresaw it, or hoped for it, as the fulfilment of a design of Ilúvatar from which great good should come? There is no hint or suggestion of such an idea elsewhere.

(iii) Orcs

There is a noteworthy remark in the tale (p. 159) concerning the origin of the Orcs (or Orqui as they were called in Tuor A, and in Tuor B as first written): "all that race were bred of the subterranean heats and slime.â There is no trace yet of the later view that ânaught that had life of its own, nor the semblance of life, could ever Melkor make since his rebellion in the AinulindalÃ« before the Beginningâ, or that the Orcs were derived from enslaved Quendi after the Awakening (The Silmarillion p. 50). Conceivably there is a first hint of this idea of their origin in the words of the tale in the same passage: âunless it be that certain of the Noldoli were twisted to the evil of Melko and mingled among these Orcsâ, although of course this is as it stands quite distinct from the idea that the Orcs were actually bred from Elves.

Here also occurs the name Glamhoth of the Orcs, a name that reappears in the later Tuor (pp. 39 and 54 note 18).

On Balrogs and Dragons in The Fall of Gondolin see pp. 212â13.

(iv) Noldorin in the Land of Willows

âDid not even after the days of Tuor Noldorin and his Eldar come there seeking for Dor LÃ³min and the hidden river and the caverns of the Gnomesâ imprisonment; yet thus nigh to their questâs end were like to abandon it? Indeed sleeping and dancing hereâthey were whelmed by the goblins sped by Melko from the Hills of Iron and Noldorin made bare escape thenceâ (p. 154). This was the Battle of Tasarinan, mentioned in the Tale of Turambar (pp. 70, 140), at the time of the great expedition of the Elves from KÃ´r. Cf. Lindoâs remark in The Cottage of Lost Play (I.16) that his father ValwÃ« âwent with Noldorin to find the Gnomesâ.

Noldorin (Salmar, companion of Ulmo) is also said in the tale to have fought beside Tulkas at the Pools of Twilight against Melko himself, though his name was struck out (p. 195 and note 38); this was after the Battle of Tasarinan. On these battles see pp. 278ff.

(v) The stature of Elves and Men

The passage concerning Tuorâs stature on p. 159, before it was rewritten (see note 18), can only mean that while Tuor was not himself unusually tall for a Man he was nonetheless taller than the Elves of Gondolin, and thus agrees with statements made in the Tale of Turambar (see p. 142). As emended, however, the meaning is rather that Men and Elves were not greatly distinct in stature.

(vi) Isfin and Eärl

The earliest version of this tale is found in the little Lost Tales notebook (see I. 171), as follows:

Isfin and Eärl

Isfin daughter of Fingolma loved from afar by Eärl (Arval) of the Mole-kin of the Gnomes. He is strong and in favour with Fingolma and with the Sons of Fëanor (to whom he is akin) because he is a leader of the Miners and searches after hidden jewels, but he is illfavoured and Isfin loathes him.

(Fingolma as a name for Finwë's Nôlem appears in outlines for Gilfanon's Tale, I.238-9.) We have here an illfavoured miner named Eärl of the Mole who loves Isfin but is rejected by her with loathing; and this is obviously closely parallel to the illfavoured miner Meglin with the sign of the sable mole seeking the hand of Idril, who rejects him, in The Fall of Gondolin. It is difficult to know how to interpret this. The simplest explanation is that the story adumbrated in the little notebook is actually earlier than that in The Fall of Gondolin; that Meglin did not yet exist; and that subsequently the image of the ugly miner's unsuccessful suitor became that of the son, the object of desire becoming Idril (niece of Isfin), while a new story was developed for the father, Eärl the dark Elf of the forest who ensnared Isfin. But it is by no means clear where Eärl the miner was when he loved from afar Isfin daughter of Fingolma. There seems to be no reason to think that he was associated with Gondolin; more probably the idea of the miner bearing the sign of the Mole entered Gondolin with Meglin.

IV

THE NAUGLAFRING

We come now to the last of the original Lost Tales to be given consecutive narrative form. This is contained in a separate notebook, and it bears the title The Nauglafring: The Necklace of the Dwarves.

The beginning of this tale is somewhat puzzling. Before the telling of The Fall of Gondolin Lindo told Littleheart that "it is the desire of all that you tell us the tales of Tuor and of Eärendel as soon as may be" (p. 144), and Littleheart replied: "It is a mighty tale, and seven times shall folk fare to the Tale-fire ere it be rightly told; and so twined is it with those stories of the Nauglafring and of the Elf-march that I would fain have aid in that telling of Ailios here!" Thus Littleheart's surrender of the chair of the tale-teller to Ailios at the beginning of the present text, so that Ailios should tell of the Nauglafring, fits the general context well; but we should not expect the new tale to be introduced with the words "But after a while silence fell," since The Fall of Gondolin ends "And no one in all the Room of Logs spake or moved for a great while." In any case, after the very long Fall of Gondolin the next tale would surely have waited till the following evening.

This tale is once again a manuscript in ink over a wholly erased original in pencil, but only so far as the words "ate his greed" on page 230. From this point to the end there is only a primary manuscript in pencil in the first stage of composition, written in haste—in places hurled on to the page, with a good many words not certainly decipherable; and a part of this was extensively rewritten while the tale was still in progress (see note 13).

The Nauglafring The Necklace of the Dwarves

But after a while silence fell, and folk murmured âEÃrendelâ, but others said âNayâwhat of the Nauglafring, the Necklace of the Dwarves.â Therefore said Ilfiniol, leaving the chair of the tale-teller: âYea, better would the tale be told if Ailios would relate the matters concerning that necklace,â and Ailios being nowise unwilling thus began, looking upon the company.

âRemember ye all how Årin the Steadfast cast the gold of Glorund before the feet of Tinwelint, and after would not touch it again, but went in sorrow back to HisilÃ³mÃ«, and there died?â And all said that that tale was still fresh in their hearts.

âBehold then,â said Ailios, âin great grief gazed the king upon Årin as he left the hall, and he was weary for the evil of Melko that thus deceived all hearts; yet tells the tale that so potent were the spells that MÃ©m the fatherless had woven about that hoard that, even as it lay upon the floor of the kingâs halls shining strangely in the light of the torches that burnt there, already were all who looked upon it touched by its subtle evil.

Now therefore did those of Årinâs band murmur, and one said to the king: âLo, lord, our captain Årin, an old man and mad, has departed, but we have no mind to forego our gain.â

Then said Tinwelint, for neither was he untouched by the golden spell: âNay then, know ye not that this gold belongs to the kindred of the Elves in common, for the Rodothlim who won it from the earth long time ago are no more, and no one has especial claim¹ to so much as a handful save only Årin by reason of his son TÃºrin, who slew the Worm, the robber of the Elves; yet TÃºrin is dead and Årin will have none of it; and TÃºrin was my man.â

At those words the outlaws fell into great wrath, until the king said: âGet ye now gone, and seek not O foolish ones to quarrel with the Elves of the forest, lest death or the dread enchantments of Valinor find you in the woods. Neither revile ye the name of Tinwelint their king, for I will reward you richly enough for your travail and the bringing of the gold. Let each one now approach and take what he may grasp with either hand, and then depart in peace.â

Now were the Elves of the wood in turn displeased, who long had stood nigh gazing on the gold; but the wild folk did as they were bid, and yet more, for some went into the hoard twice and thrice, and angry cries were raised in that hall. Then would the woodland Elves hinder them of their thieving, and a great dissension arose, so that though the king would stay them none heeded him. Then did those outlaws being fierce and fearless folk draw swords and deal blows about them, so that soon there was a great fight even upon the steps of the high-seat of the king. Doughty were those outlaws and great wielders of sword and axe from their warfare with Orcs,² so that many were slain ere the king, seeing that peace and pardon might no longer be, summoned a host of his warriors, and those outlaws being wildered with the stronger magics of the king³ and confused in the dark ways of the halls of Tinwelint were all slain fighting bitterly; but the king's hall ran with gore, and the gold that lay before his throne, scattered and spurned by trampling feet, was drenched with blood. Thus did the curse of Mâ®m the Dwarf begin its course; and yet another sorrow sown by the Noldoli of old in Valinor was come to fruit.⁴

Then were the bodies of the outlaws cast forth, but the woodland Elves that were slain Tinwelint let bury nigh to the knoll of TinÂ°viel, and âtis said that the great mound stands there still in Artanor, and for long the fairies called it CÃ»m an-Idrisaith, the Mound of Avarice.

Now came Gwenniell to Tinwelint and said: âTouch not this gold, for my heart tells me it is trebly cursed. Cursed indeed by the dragon's breath, and cursed by thy liege's blood that moistens it, and the death of those⁵ they slew; but some more bitter and more binding ill methinks hangs over it that I may not see.â

Then, remembering the wisdom of Gwenniell his wife, the king was minded to hearken to her, and he bade gather it up and cast it into the stream before the gates. Yet even so he might not shake off its spell, and he said to himself: âFirst will I gaze my last upon its loveliness ere I fling it from me for ever.â Therefore he let wash it clean of its stains of blood in clear waters, and display it before him. Now such mighty heaps of gold have never since been gathered in one place; and some thereof was wrought to cups, to basons, and to dishes, and hilts there were for swords, and scabbards, and sheaths for daggers; but the most part was of red gold unwrought lying in masses and in bars. The value of that hoard no man could count, for amid the gold lay many gems, and these were very beautiful to look upon, for the fathers of the Rodothlim had brought them out of Valinor, a portion of that boundless treasury the Noldoli had there possessed.

Now as he gazed Tinwelint said: "How glorious is this treasure! And I have not a tithe thereof, and of the gems of Valinor none save that Silmaril that Beren won from Angamandi." But Gwenniël who stood by said: "And that were worth all that here lies, were it thrice as great."

Then arose one from among the company, and that was Ufedhin, a Gnome; but more had he wandered about the world than any of the king's folk, and long had he dwelt with the Nauglath and the Indrafangs their kin. The Nauglath are a strange race and none know surely whence they be; and they serve not Melko nor Manwë and reckon not for Elf or Man, and some say that they have not heard of Ilëvatar, or hearing disbelieve. Howbeit in crafts and sciences and in the knowledge of the virtues of all things that are in the earth⁶ or under the water none excel them; yet they dwell beneath the ground in caves and tunnelled towns, and aforetime Nogrod was the mightiest of these. Old are they, and never comes a child among them, nor do they laugh. They are squat in stature, and yet are strong, and their beards reach even to their toes, but the beards of the Indrafangs are the longest of all, and are forked, and they bind them about their middles when they walk abroad. All these creatures have Men called "Dwarves", and say that their crafts and cunning surpass that of the Gnomes in marvellous contrivance, but of a truth there is little beauty in their works of themselves, for in those things of loveliness that they have wrought in ages past such renegade Gnomes as was Ufedhin have ever had a hand. Now long had that Gnome forsaken his folk, becoming leagued with the Dwarves of Nogrod, and was at that time come to the realms of Tinwelint with certain other Noldoli of like mind bearing swords and coats of mail and other smithyings of exquisite skill in which the Nauglath in those days did great traffic with the free Noldoli, and, 'tis said, with the Orcs and soldiers of Melko also.

As he stood in that place the spell of the gold had pierced the heart of Ufedhin more deeply than the heart of any there, and he could not endure that it should all be cast away, and these were his words: "An evil deed is this that Tinwelint the king intends; or who hereafter shall say that the kindreds of the Eldalië love things of beauty if a king of the Eldar cast so great a store of loveliness into the dark woodland waters where none but the fishes may after behold it? Rather than this should be, I beg of thee, O King, to suffer the craftsmen of the Dwarves to try their skill upon this unwrought gold, that the name of the golden treasury of Tinwelint become heard in all lands and places. This will they do, I promise thee, for small guerdon, might they but save the hoard from ruin.â

Then looked the king upon the gold and he looked upon Ufedhin, and that Gnome was clad very richly, having a tunic of golden web and a belt of gold set with tiny gems; and his sword was damasked in strange wise,⁷ but a collar of gold and silver interlaced most intricate was round his neck, and Tinwelintâs raiment could in no wise compare with that of the wayfarer in his halls. Again looked Tinwelint upon the gold, and it shone yet more alluring fair, nor ever had the sparkle of the gems seemed so brilliant, and Ufedhin said again: âOr in what manner, O King, dost thou guard that Silmaril of which all the world hath heard?â

Now Gwenniell warded it in a casket of wood bound with iron, and Ufedhin said it was shame so to set a jewel that should not touch aught less worthy than the purest gold. Then was Tinwelint abashed, and yielded, and this was the agreement that he made with Ufedhin. Half the gold should the king measure and give to the hands of Ufedhin and his company, and they should bear it away to Nogrod and the dwellings of the Dwarves. Now those were a very long journey southward beyond the wide forest on the borders of those great heaths nigh Umboth-muilin the Pools of Twilight, on the marches of Tasarinan. Yet after but seven full moons back would the Nauglath fare bearing the kingâs loan all wrought to works of greatest cunning, yet in no wise would the weight and purity of the gold be minished. Then would they speak to Tinwelint, and an he liked not the handiwork then would they return and say no more; yet if it seemed good to him then of that which remained would they fashion such marvellous things for his adornment and for Gwenniell the Queen as never had Gnome or Dwarf made yet.

âFor,â said Ufedhin, âthe cunning of the Nauglath have I learnt, and the beauty of design that only can the Noldoli compass do I knowâyet shall the wages of our labour be small indeed, and we will name it before thee when all is done.â

Then by reason of the glamour of the gold the king repented his agreement with Ufedhin, and he liked not altogether his words, and he would not suffer so great a store of gold to be borne without surety out of his sight for seven moons to the distant dwellings of the Dwarves; yet was he minded nonetheless to profit by their skill. Therefore suddenly he let seize Ufedhin, and his folk, and he said unto them: âHere shall ye remain as hostages in my halls until I see again my treasury.â Now Tinwelint thought in his heart that Ufedhin and his Gnomes were of the utmost service to the Dwarves, and no covetice would be strong enough to bring them to forsake him; but that Gnome was very wroth, saying: âThe Nauglath are no thieves, O King, nor yet their friendsâ but Tinwelint said: âYet the light of overmuch gold has made many thieves, who were not so before,â and Ufedhin perforce consented, yet he forgave not Tinwelint in his heart.

Therefore was the gold now borne to Nogrod by folk of the king guided by one only of Ufedhinâs companions, and the agreement of Ufedhin and Tinwelint spoken to Naugladur, the king of those places.

Now during the time of waiting Ufedhin was kindly entreated in the courts of Tinwelint, yet was he idle perforce, and he fretted inwardly. In his leisure he pondered ever what manner of lovely thing of gold and jewels he would after fashion for Tinwelint, but this was only for the greater ensnaring of the king, for already he began to weave dark plots most deep of avarice and revenge.

On the very day of the fullness of the seventh moon thereafter the watchers on the kingâs bridge cried: âLo! there comes a great company through the wood, and all it seems are aged men, and they bear very heavy burdens on their backs.â But the king hearing said: âIt is the Nauglath, who keep their tryst: now mayst thou go free, Ufedhin, and take my greeting to them, and lead them straightway to my hallâ and Ufedhin sallied forth gladly, but his heart forgot not its resentment. Therefore having speech privily with the Nauglath he prevailed upon them to demand at the end a very great reward, and one thereto that the king might not grant unhumbled; and more of his designs also did he unfold, whereby that gold might fare in the end to Nogrod for ever.

Now come the Dwarves nonetheless over the bridge and before the chair of Tinwelint, and behold, the things of their workmanship they had conveyed thither in silken cloths, and boxes of rare woods carved cunningly. In other wise had Ærin haled the treasure thither, and half thereof lay yet in his rude sacks and clumsy chests; yet when the gold was once more revealed, then did a cry of wonder arise, for the things the Nauglath had made were more wondrous far than the scanty vessels and the ornaments that the Rodothlim wrought of old. Cups and goblets did the king behold, and some had double bowls or curious handles interlaced, and horns there were of strange shape, dishes and trenchers, flagons and ewers, and all appurtenances of a kingly feast. Candlesticks there were and sconces for the torches, and none might count the rings and armlets, the bracelets and collars, and the coronets of gold; and all these were so subtly made and so cunningly adorned that Tinwelint was glad beyond the hope of Ufedhin.

But as yet the designs of Ufedhin came to nought, for in no wise would Tinwelint suffer or him or those of the Nauglath to depart to Nogrod with or without that portion of the unwrought gold that yet remained, and he said: "How shall it be thought that after the weariness of your burdened journeys hither I should let you so soon be gone, to noise the lack of courtesy of Tinwelint abroad in Nogrod? Stay now awhile and rest and feast, and afterward shall ye have the gold that remains to work your pleasure on; nor shall aught of help that I or my folk may afford be wanting in your labour, and a reward rich and more than just awaits you at the end."

But they knew nonetheless that they were prisoners, and trying the exits privily found them strongly warded. Being therefore without counsel they bowed before the king, and the faces of the Dwarf-folk show seldom what they think. Now after a time of rest was that last smithying begun in a deep place of Tinwelint's abode which he caused to be set apart for their uses, and what their hearts lacked therein fear supplied, and in all that work Ufedhin had a mighty part.

A golden crown they made for Tinwelint, who yet had worn nought but a wreath of scarlet leaves, and a helm too most glorious they fashioned; and a sword of dwarven steel brought from afar was hilted with bright gold and damascened in gold and silver with strange figurings wherein was pictured clear the wolf-hunt of Karkaras Knife-fang, father of wolves. That was a more wonderful sword than any Tinwelint had seen before, and outshone the sword in Ufedhinâs belt the king had coveted. These things were of Ufedhinâs cunning, but the Dwarves made a coat of linked mail of steel and gold for Tinwelint, and a belt of gold. Then was the kingâs heart gladdened, but they said: âAll is not finished,â and Ufedhin made a silver crown for Gwenniel, and aided by the Dwarves contrived slippers of silver crusted with diamonds, and the silver thereof was fashioned in delicate scales, so that it yielded as soft leather to the foot, and a girdle he made too of silver blended with pale gold. Yet were those things but a tithe of their works, and no tale tells a full count of them.

Now when all was done and their smithcraft given to the king, then said Ufedhin: âO Tinwelint, richest of kings, dost thou think these things fair?â And he said: âYeaâ but Ufedhin said: âKnow then that great store of thy best and purest gold remaineth still, for we have husbanded it, having a boon to ask of thee, and it is this: we would make thee a carcanet and to its making lay all the skill and cunning that we have, and we desire that this should be the most marvellous ornament that the Earth has seen, and the greatest of the works of Elves and Dwarves. Therefore we beg of thee to let us have that Silmaril that thou treasurest, that it may shine wondrously amid the Nauglafring, the Necklace of the Dwarves.â

Then again did Tinwelint doubt Ufedhinâs purpose, yet did he yield the boon, an they would suffer him to be present at that smithying.

None are that yet live,â quoth Ailios,⁸ âwho have seen that most glorious thing, save only⁹ Littleheart son of Bronweg, yet are many things told thereof. Not only was it wrought with the greatest skill and subtlety in the world but it had a magic power, and there was no throat so great or so slender whereon it sat not with grace and loveliness. Albeit a weight beyond belief of gold was used in the making, lightly it hung upon its wearer as a strand of flax; and all such as clasped it about their necks seemed, as it hung upon their breasts, to be of goodly countenance, and women seemed most fair. Gems uncounted were there in that carcanet of gold, yet only as a setting that did prepare for its great central glory, and led the eye thereto, for amidmost hung like a little lamp of limpid fire the Silmaril of Fëanor, jewel of the Gods. Yet alas, even had that gold of the Rodothlim held no evil spell still had that carcanet been a thing of little luck, for the Dwarves were full of bitterness, and all its links were twined with baleful thoughts. Now however did they bear it before the king in its new-gleaming splendour; and then was the joy of Tinwelint king of the woodland Elves come to its crowning, and he cast the Nauglafring about his throat, and straightway the curse of Mîm fell upon him. Then said Ufedhin: "Now, O Lord, that thou art pleased beyond thy hope, perchance thou wilt grant the craftsmen thy kingly reward, and suffer them to depart also in joy to their own lands."

But Tinwelint, bewildered by the golden spell and the curse of Mîm, liked not the memory of his tryst; yet dissembling he bid the craftsmen come before him, and he praised their handiwork with royal words. At length said he: "Twas said to me by one Ufedhin that at the end such reward as ye wished ye would name before me, yet would it be small enough, seeing that the labour was of love and of Ufedhin's desire that the golden hoard be not cast away and lost. What then do ye wish that I may grant?"

Then said Ufedhin scornfully: "For myself, nothing, O Lord; indeed the guestkindliness of thy halls for seven moons and three is more than I desire." But the Dwarves said: "This do we ask. For our labours during seven moons each seven jewels of Valinor, and seven robes of magic that only Gwendelin¹⁰ can weave, and each a sack of gold; but for our great labour during three moons in thy halls unwilling, we ask each three sacks of silver, and each a cup of gold wherein to pledge thy health, O King, and each a fair maiden of the woodland Elves to fare away with us to our homes."

Then was King Tinwelint wroth indeed, for what the Dwarves had asked was of itself a goodly treasury, seeing that their company was very great; and he had no mind thus to devour the dragon's hoard, but never could he deliver maidens of the Elves unto illshapen Dwarves without undying shame.

Now that demand they had made only by the design of Ufedhin, yet seeing the anger of the king's face they said: "Nay, but this is not all, for in payment of Ufedhinâs captivity for seven moons seven stout Elves must come with us and abide seven times seven years among us as bondsmen and menials in our labour.â

Thereat arose Tinwelint from his seat, and calling summoned his weaponed thanes and warriors, that these surrounded the Nauglath and those Gnomes. Then said he: âFor your insolence each three stripes with stinging withes shall ye receive, and Ufedhin seven, and afterwards will we speak of recompense.â

When this was done, and a flame of bitter vengeance lit in those deep hearts, he said: âLo, for your labour of seven months six pieces of gold and one of silver each shall have, and for your labours in my halls each three pieces of gold and some small gem that I can spare. For your journey hither a great feast shall ye eat and depart with good store against your return, and ere ye go ye shall drink to Tinwelint in elfin wine; yet, mark ye, for the sustenance of Ufedhin seven idle months about my halls shall ye each pay a piece of gold, and of silver two, for he has not aught himself and shall not receive since he desires it not, yet methinks he is at the bottom of your arrogance.â

Then were the Dwarves paid their reward like common smiths of bronze and iron, and constrained to yield once more therefrom payment for Ufedhinââelse,â said the king, ânever shall ye get him hence.â Then sat they to a great feast and dissembled their mood; yet at the end the time of their going came, and they drank to Tinwelint in elfin wine, but they cursed him in their beards, and Ufedhin swallowed not and spat the wine from his mouth upon the threshold.

Now tells the tale that the Nauglath fared home again, and if their greed had been kindled when first the gold was brought to Nogrod now was it a fierce flame of desire, and moreover they burnt under the insults of the king. Indeed all that folk love gold and silver more dearly than aught else on Earth, while that treasury was haunted by a spell and by no means were they armed against it. Now one there had been, Fangluin* the aged, who had counselled them from the first never to return the kingâs loan, for said he: âUfedhin we may later seek by guile to release, if it seem good,â but at that time this seemed not policy to Naugladur their lord, who desired not warfare with the Elves. Yet now did Fangluin jeer at them mightily on their return, saying they had flung away their labour for a botcher's wage and a draught of wine and gotten dishonour thereto, and he played upon their lust, and Ufedhin joined his bitter words thereto. Therefore did Naugladur hold a secret council of the Dwarves of Nogrod, and sought how he might both be avenged upon Tinwelint, and sate his greed.¹¹

Yet after long pondering he saw not how he might achieve his purpose save by force, and there was little hope therein, both by reason of the great strength of numbers of the Elves of Artanor in those days, and of the woven magic of Gwenniell that guarded all those regions, so that men of hostile heart were lost and came not to those woods; nor indeed could any such come thither unaided by treachery from within.

Now even as those aged ones sat in their dark halls and gnawed their beards, behold a sound of horns, and messengers were come from Bodruith of the Indrafangs, a kindred of the Dwarves that dwelt in other realms. Now these brought tidings of the death of Mâ the fatherless at the hand of Árin and the rape of Glorund's gold, which tale had but new come to Bodruith's ears. Now hitherto the Dwarves knew not the full tale concerning that hoard, nor more than Ufedhin might tell hearing the speech in Tinwelint's halls, and Árin had not spoken the full count thereof ere he departed. Hearing therefore these tidings new wrath was added to their lust and a clamour arose among them, and Naugladur vowed to rest not ere Mâ was thrice avenged—and more, said he, —seems the gold belongs of right to the people of the Dwarves.

This then was the design; and by his deeds have the Dwarves been severed in feud for ever since those days with the Elves, and drawn more nigh in friendship to the kin of Melko. Secretly he let send to the Indrafangs that they prepare their host against a day that he would name, whenso the time should be ripe; and a hidden forging of bitter steel then was in Belegost the dwelling of the Indrafangs. Moreover he gathered about him a great host of the Orcs, and wandering goblins, promising them a good wage, and the pleasure of their Master moreover, and a rich booty at the end; and all these he armed with his own weapons. Now came unto Naugladur an Elf, and he was one of Tinwelint's folk, and he offered to lead that host through the magics of Gwendelin, for he was bitten by the gold-lust of Glorund's hoard, and so did the curse of MÃ© come upon Tinwelint and treachery first arose among the Elves of Artanor. Then did Naugladur [?smile] bitterly, for he knew that the time was ripe and Tinwelint delivered to him. Now each year about the time of the great wolf-hunt of Beren Tinwelint was wont to keep the memory of that day by a hunt in the woods, and it was a very mighty chase and thronged with very many folk, and nights of merriment and feasting were there in the forest. Now Naugladur learnt of that Elf NARTHSEG, whose name is bitter to the Eldar yet, that the king would fare a-hunting at the next high moon but one, and straightway he sent the trusted sign, a bloodstained knife, to Bodruith at Belegost. Now all that host assembled on the confines of the woods, and no word came yet unto the king.

Now tells the tale that one came unto Tinwelint, and Tinwelint knew him not for the wild growth of his hairâand lo! it was Mablung, and he said: âLo, even in the depths of the forest have we heard that this year you will celebrate the death of Karkaras with a high-tide greater than even before, O Kingâand behold I have returned to bear you company.â And the king was full of mirth and fain to greet Mablung the brave; and at the words of Mablung that Huan captain of Dogs was come also into Artanor was he glad indeed.

Behold now Tinwelint the king rode forth a-hunting, and more glorious was his array than ever aforetime, and the helm of gold was above his flowing locks, and with gold were the trappings of his steed adorned; and the sunlight amid the trees fell upon his face, and it seemed to those that beheld it like to the glorious face of the sun at morning; for about his throat was clasped the Nauglafring, the Necklace of the Dwarves. Beside him rode Mablung the Heavyhand in the place of honour by reason of his deeds at that great hunt aforetimeâbut Huan of the Dogs was ahead of the hunters, and men thought that great dog bore him strangely, but mayhap there was something in the wind that day he liked not.

Now is the king far in the woods with all his company, and the horns grow faint in the deep forest, but Gwendelin sits in her bower and foreboding is in her heart and eyes. Then said an Elfmaid, Nielthi: âWherefore, O Lady, art thou sorrowful at the hightide of the king?â And Gwendelin said: âEvil seeks our land, and my heart misgives me that my days in Artanor are speeding to their end, yet if I should lose Tinwelint then would I wish never to have wandered forth from Valinor.â But Nielthi said: âNay, O Lady Gwendelin, hast thou not woven great magic all about us, so that we fear not?â But the queen made answer: âYet meseems there is a rat that gnaws the threads and all the web has come unwoven.â Even at that word there was a cry about the doors, and suddenly it grew to a fierce noiseâ|by the clash of steel. Then went Gwendelin unafraid forth from her bower, and behold, a sudden multitude of Orcs and Indrafangs held the bridge, and there was war within the cavernous gates; but that place ran with blood, and a great heap of slain lay there, for the onset had been secret and all unknown.

Then did Gwendelin know well that her foreboding was true, and that treachery had found her realm at last, yet did she hearten those few guards that remained to her and had fared not to the hunt, and valiantly they warded the palace of the king until the tide of numbers bore them back [and] fire and blood found all the halls and deep ways of that great fortress of the Elves.

Then did those Orcs and Dwarves ransack all the chambers seeking for treasure, and lo! one came and sate him in the high seat of the king laughing loud, and Gwendelin saw that it was Ufedhin, and mocking he bid her be seated in her ancient seat beside the kingâs. Then Gwendelin gazed upon him so that his glance fell, and she said: âWherefore, O renegade, dost thou defile my lordâs seat? Little had I thought to see any of the Elves sit there, a robber, stained with murder, a league-fellow of the truceless enemies of his kin. Or thinkest thou it is a glorious deed to assail an ill-armed house what time its lord is far away?â But Ufedhin said nought, shunning the bright eyes of Gwendelin, wherefore said she anew: âGet thee now gone with thy foul Orcs, lest Tinwelint coming repay thee bitterly.â

Then at last did Ufedhin answer, and he laughed, but ill at ease, and he looked not at the queen, but he said listening to a sound without: âNay, but already is he come.â And behold, Naugladur entered now and a host of the Dwarves were about him, but he bore the head of Tinwelint crowned and helmed in gold; but the necklace of all wonder was clasped about the throat of Naugladur. Then did Gwendelin see in her heart all that had befallen, and how the curse of the gold had fallen on the realm of Artanor, and never has she danced or sung since that dark hour; but Naugladur bid gather all things of gold or silver or of precious stones and bear them to Nogrodâand whatso remains of goods or folk may the Orcs keep, or slay, as they desire. Yet the Lady Gwendelin Queen of Artanor shall fare with me.â

Then said Gwendelin: âThief and murderer, child of Melko, yet art thou a fool, for thou canst not see what hangs over thine own head.â By reason of the anguish of her heart was her sight grown very clear, and she read by her fay-wisdon the curse of MÃ®m and much of what would yet betide.

Then did Naugladur in his triumph laugh till his beard shook, and bid seize her: but none might do so, for as they came towards her they groped as if in sudden dark, or stumbled and fell tripping each the other, and Gwendelin went forth from the places of her abode, and her bitter weeping filled the forest. Now did a great darkness fall upon her mind and her counsel and lore forsook her, that she wandered she knew not whither for a great while; and this was by reason of her love for Tinwelint the king, for whom she had chosen never to fare back to Valinor and the beauty of the Gods, dwelling always in the wild forests of the North; and now did there seem to her neither beauty nor joy be it in Valinor or in the Lands Without. Many of the scattered Elves in her wayward journeyings she met, and they took pity on her, but she heeded them not. Tales had they told her, but she hearkened not over much since Tinwelint was dead; nonetheless must ye know how even in the hour that Ufedhinâs host brake the palace and despoiled it, and other companies as great and as terrible of the Orcs and Indrafangs fell with death and fire upon all the realm of Tinwelint, behold the brave hunt of the king were resting amid mirth and laughter, but Huan stalked apart. Then suddenly were the woods filled with noise and Huan bayed aloud; but the king and his company were all encircled with armed foes. Long they fought bitterly there among the trees, and the Nauglathâfor such were their foesâhad great scathe of them or ever they were slain. Yet in the end were they all fordone, and Mablung and the king fell side by sideâbut Naugladur it was who swept off the head of Tinwelint after he was dead, for living he dared not so near to his bright sword or the axe of Mablung.¹²

Now doth the tale know no more to tell of Huan, save that even while the swords still sang that great dog was speeding through the land, and his way led him as the [?wind] to the land of iÂ·Guilwarthon, the living-dead, where reigned Beren and TinÂ°viel the daughter of Tinwelint. Not in any settled abode did those twain dwell, nor had their realm boundaries well-markedâand indeed no other messenger save Huan alone to whom all ways were known had ever found Beren and obtained his aid so soon.¹³ Indeed the tale tells that even as that host of the Orcs were burning all the land of Tinwelint and the Nauglath and the Indrafangin were wending homeward burdened utterly with spoils of gold and precious things, came Huan to Berenâs lodge, and it was dusk. Lo, Beren sat upon a tree root and TinÂ°viel danced on a green sward in the gloaming as he gazed upon her, when suddenly stood Huan before them, and Beren gave a cry of joy and wonder, for it was long since he and Huan had hunted together. But TinÂ°viel looking upon Huan saw that he bled, and there was a tale to read in his great eyes. And she said suddenly: âWhat evil then has fallen upon Artanor?â and Huan said: âFire and death and the terror of Orcs; but Tinwelint is slain.â

Then did both Beren and TinÂ°viel weep bitter tears; nor did the full tale of Huan dry their eyes. When then it was told to the end leapt Beren to his feet in white wrath, and seizing a horn that hung at his belt he blew a clear blast thereon that rang round all the neighbouring hills, and an elfin folk all clad in green and brown sprang as it were by magic towards him from every glade and coppice, stream and fell.

Now not even Beren knew the tale of those myriad folk that followed his horn in the woods of HisilÂ³mÂ«, and or ever the moon was high above the hills the host assembled in the glade of his abiding was very great, yet were they lightly armed and the most bore only knives and bows. âYet,â said Beren, âspeed is that which now we need the mostâ and certain Elves at his bidding fared like deer before him, seeking news of the march of the Dwarves and Indrafangs, but at dawn he followed at the head of the green Elves, and TinÂ°viel abode in the glade and wept unto herself for the death of Tinwelint, and Gwendelin also she mourned as dead.

Now is to tell that the laden host of the Dwarves fared from the place of their ransacking, and Naugladur was at their head, and beside him Ufedhin and Bodruith; and ever as he rode Ufedhin sought to put the dread eyes of Gwendelin from his mind and could not, and all happiness was fled from his heart that shrivelled under the memory of that glance; nor was this the only disquiet that tortured him, for if ever he raised his eyes lo! they lighted on the Necklace of the Dwarves shining about the aged neck of Naugladur, and then all other thoughts save bottomless desire of its beauty were banished.

Thus did those three fare and with them all their host, but so great became the torment of Ufedhinâs mind that in the end he might not endure it more, but at night when a halt was called he crept stealthily to the place where Naugladur slept, and coming upon that aged one wrapt in slumbers would slay that Dwarf and lay hands upon the wondrous Nauglafring. Now even as he sought to do so, behold one seized his throat suddenly from behind, and it was Bodruith, who filled with the same lust sought also to make that lovely thing his own; but coming upon Ufedhin would slay him by reason of his kinship to Naugladur. Then did Ufedhin stab suddenly backward at hazard in the dark with a keen knife long and slender that he had with him for the bane of Naugladur, and that knife pierced the vitals of Bodruith Lord of Belegost so that he fell dying upon Naugladur, and the throat of Naugladur and the magic carcanet were drenched anew with blood.

Thereat did Naugladur awake with a great cry, but Ufedhin fled gasping from that place, for the long fingers of the Indrafang had well-nigh choked him. Now when some bore torches swiftly to that place Naugladur thought that Bodruith alone had sought to rob him of the jewel, and marvelled how he had thus been timely slain, and he proclaimed a rich reward to the slayer of Bodruith if that man would come forward telling all that he had seen. Thus was it that none perceived the flight of Ufedhin for a while, and wrath awoke between the Dwarves of Nogrod and the Indrafangs, and many were slain ere the Indrafangs being in less number were scattered and got them as best they might to Belegost, bearing scant treasury with them. Of this came the agelong feud between those kindreds of the Dwarves that has spread to many lands and caused many a tale, whereof the Elves know little tidings and Men have seldom heard. Yet may it be seen how the curse of MÃ© came early home to rest among his own kin, and would indeed it had gone no further and had visited the Eldar never more.

Lo, when the flight of Ufedhin came also to light then was Naugladur in wrath, and he let kill all the Gnomes that remained in the host. Then said he: âNow are we rid of Indrafangs and Gnomes and all traitors, and nought more do I fear at all.â

But Ufedhin ranged the wild lands in great fear and anguish, for him seemed that he had become a traitor to his kin, blood-guilty to the Elves, and haunted with the [?burning] eyes of Gwendelin the queen, for nought but exile and misery, and no smallest part nor share had he in the gold of Glorund, for all his heart was afire with lust; yet few have pitied him.

Now tells the tale that he fell in with the rangers of Berenâs folk, and these gaining from him sure knowledge of all the host and array of Naugladur and the ways he purposed to follow, they sped back like wind among the trees unto their lord; but Ufedhin revealed not to them who he was, feigning to be an Elf of Artanor escaped from bondage in their host. Now therefore they entreated him well, and he was sent back to Beren that their captain mightâ|â|â|his words, and albeit Beren marvelled at his [?cowardly]â|â|¹⁴ and downward glance it seemed to him that he brought safe word, and he set a trap for Naugladur.

No longer did he march hotly on the trail of the Dwarves, but knowing that they would essay the passage of the river Aros at a certain time he turned aside, faring swiftly with his light-footed Elves by straighter paths that he might reach Sarnathrod the Stony Ford before them. Now the Aros is a fierce streamâand is it not that very water that more near its spring runs swiftly past the aged doors of the Rodothlimâs caves and the dark lairs of Glorund¹⁵âand in those lower regions by no means can be crossed by a great host of laden men save at this ford, nor is it overeasy here. Never would Naugladur have taken that way had he knowledge of Berenâyet blinded by the spell and the dazzling gold he feared nought either within or without his host, and he was in haste to reach Nogrod and its dark caverns, for the Dwarves list not long to abide in the bright light of day.

Now came all that host to the banks of Aros, and their array was thus: first a number of unladen Dwarves most fully armed, and amidmost the great company of those that bore the treasury of Glorund, and many a fair thing beside that they had haled from Tinwelintâs halls; and behind these was Naugladur, and he bestrode Tinwelintâs horse, and a strange figure did he seem, for the legs of the Dwarves are short and crooked, but two Dwarves led that horse for it went not willingly and it was laden with spoil. But behind these came again a mass of armed men but little laden; and in this array they sought to cross Sarnathrod on their day of doom.

Morn was it when they reached the hither bank and high noon saw them yet passing in long-strung lines and wading slowly the shallow places of the swift-running stream. Here doth it widen out and fare down narrow channels filled with boulders atween long spits of shingle and stones less great. Now did Naugladur slip from his burdened horse and prepare to get him over, for the armed host of the vanguard had climbed already the further bank, and it was great and sheer and thick with trees, and the bearers of the gold were some already stepped thereon and some amidmost of the stream, but the armed men of the rear were resting awhile.

Suddenly is all that place filled with the sound of elfin horns, and oneâs¹⁶ with a clearer blast above the rest, and it is the horn of Beren, the huntsman of the woods. Then is the air thick with the slender arrows of the Eldar that err not neither doth the wind bear them aside, and lo, from every tree and boulder do the brown Elves and the green spring suddenly and loose unceasingly from full quivers. Then was there a panic and a noise in the host of Naugladur, and those that waded in the ford cast their golden burdens in the waters and sought affrighted to either bank, but many were stricken with those pitiless darts and fell with their gold into the currents of the Aros, staining its clear waters with their dark blood.

Now were the warriors on the far bank [?wrapped] in battle and rallying sought to come at their foes, but these fled nimbly before them, while [?others] poured still the hail of arrows upon them, and thus got the Eldar few hurts and the Dwarf-folk fell dead unceasingly. Now was that great fight of the Stony Fordâs nigh to Naugladur, for even though Naugladur and his captains led their bands stoutly never might they grip their foe, and death fell like rain upon their ranks until the most part broke and fled, and a noise of clear laughter echoed from the Elves thereat, and they forebore to shoot more, for the illshapen figures of the Dwarves as they fled, their white beards torn by the wind, filled them [with] mirth. But now stood Naugladur and few were about him, and he remembered the words of Gwendelin, for behold, Beren came towards him and he cast aside his bow, and drew a bright sword; and Beren was of great stature among the Eldar, albeit not of the girth and breadth of Naugladur of the Dwarves.

Then said Beren: "Ward thy life an thou canst, O crook-legged murderer, else will I take it," and Naugladur bid him even the Nauglafring, the necklace of wonder, that he be suffered to go unharmed; but Beren said: "Nay, that may I still take when thou art slain," and thereat he made alone upon Naugladur and his companions, and having slain the foremost of these the others fled away amid elfin laughter, and so Beren came upon Naugladur, slayer of Tinwelint. Then did that aged one defend himself doughtily, and 'twas a bitter fight, and many of the Elves that watched for love and fear of their captain fingered their bowstrings, but Beren called even as he fought that all should stay their hands.

Now little doth the tale tell of wounds and blows of that affray, save that Beren got many hurts therein, and many of his shrewdest blows did little harm to Naugladur by reason of the [? skill] and magic of his dwarfen mail; and it is said that three hours they fought and Beren's arms grew weary, but not those of Naugladur accustomed to wield his mighty hammer at the forge, and it is more than like that otherwise would the issue have been but for the curse of Mä®m; for marking how Beren grew faint Naugladur pressed him ever more nearly, and the arrogance that was of that grievous spell came into his heart, and he thought: "I will slay this Elf, and his folk will flee in fear before me," and grasping his sword he dealt a mighty blow and cried: "Take here thy bane, O stripling of the woods," and in that moment his foot found a jagged stone and he stumbled forward, but Beren slipped aside from that blow and catching at his beard his hand found the carcanet of gold, and therewith he swung Naugladur suddenly off his feet upon his face: and Naugladur's sword was shaken from his grasp, but Beren seized it and slew him therewith, for he said: "I will not sully my bright blade with thy dark blood, since there is no need." But the body of Naugladur was cast into the Aros.

Then did he unloose the necklace, and he gazed in wonder at it and beheld the Silmaril, even the jewel he won from Angband and gained undying glory by his deed; and he said: "Never have mine eyes beheld thee O Lamp of Faery burn one half so fair as now thou dost, set in gold and gems and the magic of the Dwarves and that necklace he caused to be washed of its stains, and he cast it not away, knowing nought of its power, but bore it with him back into the woods of Hithlum.

But the waters of Aros flowed on for ever above the drowned hoard of Glorund, and so do still, for in after days Dwarves came from Nogrod and sought for it, and for the body of Naugladur; but a flood arose from the mountains and therein the seekers perished; and so great now is the gloom and dread of that Stony Ford that none seek the treasure that it guards nor dare ever to cross the magic stream at that enchanted place.

But in the vales of Hithlum was there gladness at the homecoming of the Elves, and great was the joy of Tinviel to see her lord once more returning amidst his companies, but little did it ease her grief for the death of Tinwelint that Naugladur was slain and many Dwarves beside. Then did Beren seek to comfort her, and taking her in his arms he set the glorious Nauglafring about her neck, and all were blinded by the greatness of her beauty; and Beren said: "Behold the Lamp of Faenor that thou and I did win from Hell," and Tinviel smiled, remembering the first days of their love and those days of travail in the wild.

Now is it to be said that Beren sent for Ufedhin and well rewarded him for his words of true guidance whereof the Dwarves had been overcome, and he bid him dwell in among his folk, and Ufedhin was little loth; yet on a time, no great space thereafter, did that thing betide which he least desired. For came there a sound of very sorrowful singing in the woods, and behold, it was Gwendelin wandering distraught, and her feet bore her to the midmost of a glade where sat Beren and Tinviel; and at that hour it was new morning, but at the sound all night ceased their speaking and were very still. Then did Beren gaze in awe upon Gwendelin, but Tinviel cried suddenly in sorrow mixed with joy: "O mother Gwendelin, whither do thy feet bear thee, for methought thee dead" but the greeting of those twain upon the greensward was very sweet. And Ufedhin fled from among the Elves, for he could not endure to look upon the eyes of Gwendelin, and madness took him, and none may say what was his unhappy weird thereafter; and little but a tortured heart got he from the Gold of Glorund.

Now hearing the cries of Ufedhin Gwendelin looked in wonder after him, and stayed her tender words; and memory came back into her eyes so that she cried as in amaze beholding the Necklace of the Dwarves that hung about the white throat of TinÃ°viel. Then wrathfully she asked of Beren what it might portend, and wherefore he suffered the accursed thing to touch TinÃ°viel; and told Beren¹⁷ all that tale such as Huan had told him, in deed or guess, and of the pursuit and fighting at the ford he told also, saying at the end: âNor indeed do I see who, now that Lord Tinwelint is fared to Valinor, should so fittingly wear that jewel of the Gods as TinÃ°viel.â But Gwendelin told of the dragonâs ban upon the gold and the [?staining] of blood in the kingâs halls, âand yet another and more potent curse, whose arising I know not, is woven therewith,â said she, ânor methinks was the labour of the Dwarves free from spells of the most enduring malice.â But Beren laughed, saying that the glory of the Silmaril and its holiness might overcome all such evils, even as it burnt the [?foul] flesh of Karkaras. âNor,â said he, âhave I seen ever my TinÃ°viel so fair as now she is, clasped in the loveliness of this thing of goldâ but Gwendelin said: âYet the Silmaril abode in the Crown of Melko, and that is the work of baleful smiths indeed.â

Then said TinÃ°viel that she desired not things of worth or precious stones but the elfin gladness of the forest, and to pleasure Gwendelin she cast it from her neck; but Beren was little pleased and he would not suffer it to be flung away, but warded it in hisâ|â|¹⁸

Thereafter did Gwendelin abide a while in the woods among them and was healed; and in the end she fared wistfully back to the land of LÃ³rien and came never again into the tales of the dwellers of Earth; but upon Beren and TinÃ°viel fell swiftly that doom of mortality that Mandos had spoken when he sped them from his hallsâand in this perhaps did the curse of MÃ©m have [?potency] in that it came more soon upon them; nor this time did those twain fare the road together, but when yet was the child of those twain, Dior¹⁹ the Fair, a little one, did TinÃ°viel slowly fade, even as the Elves of later days have done throughout the world, and she vanished in the woods, and none have seen her dancing ever there again. But Beren searched all the lands of Hithlum and of Artanor ranging after her; and never has any of the Elves had more loneliness than his, or ever he too faded from life, and Dior his son was left ruler of the brown Elves and the green, and Lord of the Nauglafring.

Mayhap what all Elves say is true, that those twain hunt now in the forest of Orom^Ã in Valinor, and Tin^Ãviel dances on the green swards of Nessa and of V^Ãina daughters of the Gods for ever more; yet great was the grief of the Elves when the Guilwarthon went from among them, and being leaderless and lessened of magic their numbers minished; and many fared away to Gondolin, the rumour of whose growing power and glory ran in secret whispers among all the Elves.

Still did Dior when come to manhood rule a numerous folk, and he loved the woods even as Beren had done; and songs name him mostly Ausir the Wealthy for his possession of that wondrous gem set in the Necklace of the Dwarves. Now the tales of Beren and Tin^Ãviel grew dim in his heart, and he took to wearing it about his neck and to love its loveliness most dearly; and the fame of that jewel spread like fire through all the regions of the North, and the Elves said one to another: âA Silmaril of F^Ãanor burns in the woods of Hisil^Ãm^Ã.â

Now fare the long days of Elfinesse unto that time when Tuor dwelt in Gondolin; and children then had Dior the Elf,²⁰ Auredhir and Elwing, and Auredhir was most like to his forefather Beren, and all loved him, yet none so dearly as did Dior; but Elwing the fairy have all poesies named as beautiful as Tin^Ãviel if that indeed may be, yet hard is it to say seeing the great loveliness of the elfin folk of yore. Now those were days of happiness in the vales of Hithlum, for there was peace with Melko and the Dwarves who had but one thought as they plotted against Gondolin, and Angband was full of labour; yet is it to tell that bitterness entered into the hearts of the seven sons of F^Ãanor, remembering their oath. Now Maidros, whom Melko maimed, was their leader; and he called to his brethren Maglor and Dinithel, and to Damrod, and to Celegorm, to Cranthor and to Curufin the Crafty, and he said to them how it was now known to him that a Silmaril of those their father F^Ãanor had made was now the pride and glory of Dior of the southern vales, and Elwing his daughter bears it whitherso she goes—but do you not forget,” said he, “that we swore to have no peace with Melko nor any of his folk, nor with any other of Earth-dwellers that held the Silmarils of Fëanor from us. For what,” said Maidros, “do we suffer exile and wandering and rule over a scant and forgotten folk, if others gather to their hoard the heirlooms that are ours?”

Thus was it that they sent Curufin the Crafty to Dior, and told him of their oath, and bid him give that fair jewel back unto those whose right it was; but Dior gazing on the loveliness of Elwing would not do so, and he said that he could not endure that the Nauglafring, fairest of earthly craft, be so despoiled. Then,” said Curufin, “must the Nauglafring unbroken be given to the sons of Fëanor,” and Dior waxed wroth, bidding him be gone, nor dare to claim what his sire Beren the Onehanded won with his hand from the [?jaws] of Melko—“other twain are there in the selfsame place,” said he, “an your hearts be bold enow.”

Then went Curufin unto his brethren, and because of their unbreakable oath and of their [?thirst] for that Silmaril (nor indeed was the spell of Mäem and of the dragon wanting) they planned war upon Dior—and the Eldar cry shame upon them for that deed, the first premeditated war of elfin folk upon elfin folk, whose name otherwise were glorious among the Eldali—“for their sufferings. Little good came thereby to them; for they fell unawares upon Dior, and Dior and Auredhir were slain, yet behold, Evranin the nurse of Elwing, and Gereth a Gnome, took her unwilling in a flight swift and sudden from those lands, and they bore with them the Nauglafring, so that the sons of Fëanor saw it not; but a host of Dior’s folk, coming with all speed yet late unto the fray, fell suddenly on their rear, and there was a great battle, and Maglor was slain with swords, and Maiâ²¹ died of wounds in the wild, and Celegorm was pierced with a hundred arrows, and Cranthor beside him. Yet in the end were the sons of Fëanor masters of the field of slain, and the brown Elves and the green were scattered over all the lands unhappy, for they would not hearken to Maidros the maimed, nor to Curufin and Damrod who had slain their lord; and it is said that even on the day of that battle of the Elves Melko sought against Gondolin, and the fortunes of the Elves came to their uttermost waning.

Now was naught left of the seed of Beren Ermabwed son of Egnor save Elwing the Lovely, and she wandered in the woods, and of the brown Elves and the green a few gathered to her, and they departed for ever from the glades of Hithlum and got them to the south towards Sirionâs deep waters, and the pleasant lands.

And thus did all the fates of the fairies weave then to one strand, and that strand is the great tale of Eärendel; and to that taleâs true beginning are we now come.

Then said Ailios: âAnd methinks that is tale enow for this time of telling.â

NOTES

- 1 This sentence is a rewriting of the text, which had originally:

âNay then, know ye not that this gold belongs to the kindred of the Elves, who won it from the earth long time ago, and no one among Men has claimâ|â

The remainder of this scene, ending with the slaughter of Ærinâs band, was rewritten at many points, with the same object as in the passage just citedâto convert Ærinâs band from Men to Elves, as was done also at the end of Eltasâ tale (see p. 118 note 33). Thus original âElvesâ was changed to âElves of the wood, woodland Elvesâ, and original âMenâ to âfolk, outlawsâ and see notes 2, 3, 5.

- 2 The original sentence here was:

Doughty were those Men and great wielders of sword and axe, and still in those unfaded days might mortal weapons wound the bodies of the elfin-folk.

See note 1.

- 3 The original sentence here was: âand those Men being wildered with magicsâ. See note 1.
- 4 This sentence, from âand yet another sorrowâ|â, was added to the text later.

- 5 âthosê: the text has âthe Menâ, obviously left unchanged through oversight. See note 1.
- 6 âin the earthâ is an emendation of the original reading âon the earthâ.
- 7 âdamasked in strange wiseâ, i.e. âdamascenedâ, ornamentally inlaid with designs in gold and silver. The word âdamascenedâ is used of the sword of Tinwelint made by the Dwarves, on which were seen images of the wolf-hunt (p. 227), and of Glorfindelâs arms (p. 173).
- 8 The text has âEltasâ, but with âAiliosâ written above in pencil. Since Ailios appears as the teller at the beginning of the tale, and not as the result of emendation, âEltasâ here was probably no more than a slip.
- 9 âsave onlyâ is a later emendation of the original ânot evenâ. See p. 256.
- 10 It is odd that Gwendelin appears here, not Gwenniel as hitherto in this tale. Since the first part of the tale is in ink over an erased pencil text, the obvious explanation is that the erased text had Gwendelin and that my father changed this to Gwenniel as he went along, overlooking it in this one instance. But the matter is probably more complexâone of those small puzzles with which the texts of the Lost Tales aboundâfor after the manuscript in ink ceases the form Gwenniel occurs, though once only, and Gwendelin is then used for all the rest of the tale. See Changes made to Names, p. 244.
- 11 Here the manuscript in ink ends; see p. 221.
- 12 Against this sentence my father wrote a direction that the story was to be that the Nauglafring caught in the bushes and held the king.
- 13 A rejected passage in the manuscript here gives an earlier version of the events, according to which it was Gwendelin, not Huan, who brought the news to Beren:

and her bitter weeping filled the forest. Now there did Gwendeling [sic] gather to her many of the scattered woodland Elves and of them did she hear how matters had fared even as she had guessed: how the hunting party had been surrounded and overwhelmed by the Nauglath while the Indrafangs and Orcs fell suddenly with death and fire upon all the realm of Tinwelint, and not the least host was that of Ufedhin that slew the guardians of the bridge; and it was said that Naugladur had slain Tinwelint when he was borne down by numbers, and folk thought Narthseg a wild Elf had led the foemen hither, and he had been slain in the fighting.

Then seeing no hope Gwendelin and her companions fared with the utmost speed out of that land of sorrow, even to the kingdom of i.Guilwarthon in Hisil³m, where reigned Beren and Tinviel her daughter. Now Beren and Tinviel lived not in any settled abode, nor had their realm boundaries well-marked, and no other messenger save Gwendelin daughter of the Vali had of a surety found those twain the living-dead so soon.

It is clear from the manuscript that the return of Mablung and Huan to Artanor and their presence at the hunt (referred to in general terms at the end of the Tale of Tinviel, p. 41) was added to the tale, and with this new element went the change in Gwendelin's movements immediately after the disaster. But though the textual history is here extremely hard to interpret, what with erasures and additions on loose pages, I think it is almost certain that this reshaping was done while the original composition of the tale was still in progress.

- 14 The first of these lacunae that I have left in the text contains two words, the first possibly believe and the second probably best. In the second lacuna the word might conceivably be pallor.
- 15 This sentence, from and is it not that very water, is struck through and bracketed, and in the margin my father scribbled: No [that] is Narog.

- 16 The illegible word might be âbraysâ: the word âclearerâ is an emendation from âhoarserâ.
- 17 âand told Berenâ: i.e., âand Beren toldâ. The text as first written had âThen told Berenâ|â
- 18 The illegible word might just possibly be âtreasuryâ, but I do not think that it is.
- 19 Dior replaced the name Ausir, which however occurs below as another name for Dior.
- 20 âDior the Elfâ is an emendation from âDior then an aged Elfâ.
- 21 The latter part of this name is quite unclear: it might be read as Maithog, or as Mailweg. See Changes made to Names under Dinithel.

Changes made to names in The Tale of the Nauglafring

Ilfiniol (p. 221) here so written from the first: see p. 201.

Gwenniel is used throughout the revised section of the tale except at the last occurrence (p. 228), where the form is Gwendelin; in the pencilled part of the tale at the first occurrence of the queen's name it is again Gwenniel (p. 230), but thereafter always Gwendelin (see note 10).

The name of the queen in the Lost Tales is as variable as that of Littleheart. In The Chaining of Melko and The Coming of the Elves she is Tindriel > Wendelin. In the Tale of TinÃ^oviel she is Wendelin > Gwendeling (see p. 50); in the typescript text of TinÃ^oviel Gwenethlin > Melian; in the Tale of Turambar Gwendeling > Gwedheling; in the present tale Gwendelin/Gwenniel (the form Gwendeling occurs in the rejected passage given in note 13); and in the Gnomish dictionary Gwendeling > Gwedhiling.

Belegost At the first occurrence (p. 230) the manuscript has Ost Belegost, with Ost circled as if for rejection, and Belegost is the reading subsequently.

(iÂ·) Guilwarthon In the Tale of TinÃ^oviel, p. 41, the form is i. Cuilwarthon. At the occurrence on p. 240 the ending of the name does not look like-on, but as I cannot say what it is I give Guilwarthon in the text.

Dinithel could also be read as Durithel (p. 241). This name was written in later in ink over an earlier name in pencil now scarcely legible, though clearly the same as that beginning Maiâ which appears for this son of FÃ«anor subsequently (see note 21).

Commentary on The Tale of the Nauglafring

In this commentary I shall not compare in detail the Tale of the Nauglafring with the story told in The Silmarillion (Chapter 22, Of the Ruin of Doriath). The stories are profoundly different in essential featuresâabove all, in the reduction of the treasure brought by HÃ«rin from Nargothrond to a single object, the Necklace of the Dwarves, which had long been in existence (though not, of course, containing the Silmaril); while the whole history of the relation between Thingol and the Dwarves is changed. My father never again wrote any part of this story on a remotely comparable scale, and the formation of the published text was here of the utmost difficulty; I hope later to give an account of it.

While it is often difficult to differentiate what my father omitted in his more concise versions (in order to keep them concise) from what he rejected, it seems clear that a large part of the elaborate narrative of the Tale of the Nauglafring was early abandoned. In subsequent writing the story of the fighting between Ãrinâs band and Tinwelintâs Elves disappeared, and there is no trace afterwards of Ufedhin or the other Gnomes that lived among the Dwarves, of the story that the Dwarves took half the unwrought gold (âthe kingâs loanâ) away to Nogrod to make precious objects from it, of the keeping of Ufedhin hostage, of Tinwelintâs refusal to let the Dwarves depart, of their outrageous demands, of their scourging and their insulting payment.

We meet here again the strong emphasis on Tinwelintâs love of treasure and lack of it, in contrast to the later conception of his vast wealth (see my remarks, pp. 128â9). The Silmaril is kept in a wooden casket (p. 225), Tinwelint has no crown but a wreath of scarlet leaves (p. 227), and he is far less richly clad and accoutred than âthe wayfarer in his hallsâ (Ufedhin). This is very well in itselfâthe Woodland Elf corrupted by the lure of golden splendour, but it need not be remarked again how strangely at variance is this picture with that of Thingol Lord of Beleriand, who had a vast treasury in his marvellous underground realm of Menegroth, the Thousand Cavesâitself largely contrived by the Dwarves of Belegost in the distant past (The Silmarillion pp. 92â3), and who most certainly did not need the aid of Dwarves at this time to make him a crown and a fine sword, or vessels to adorn his banquets. Thingol in the later conception is proud, and stern; he is also wise, and powerful, and greatly increased in stature and in knowledge through his union with a Maia. Could such a king have sunk to the level of miserly swindling that is portrayed in the Tale of the Nauglafring?

Great stress is indeed placed on the enormous size of the hoardâsuch mighty heaps of gold have never since been gathered in one placeâ, p. 223âwhich is made so vast that it becomes hard to believe that a band of wandering outlaws could have brought it to the halls of the woodland Elves, even granting that âsome was lost upon the wayâ (p. 114). There is perhaps some difference here from the account of the Rodothlim and their works in the Tale of Turambar (p. 81), where there is certainly no suggestion that the Rodothlim possessed treasures coming out of Valinorâthough this idea remained through all the vicissitudes of this part of the story: it is said of the Lord of Nargothrond in The Silmarillion (p. 114) that âFinrod had brought more treasures out of Tirion than any other of the princes of the Noldorâ.

More important, the elements of âspellâ and âcurseâ are dominant in this tale, to such a degree that they might almost be said to be the chief actors in it. The curse of MÃm on the gold is felt at every turn of the narrative. Vengeance for him is one motive in Naugladurâs decision to attack the Elves of Artanor (p. 230). His curse is fulfilled in the âagelong feudâ between the kindreds of the Dwarves (p. 235)âof which all trace was afterwards effaced, with the loss of the entire story of Ufedhinâs intent to steal the Necklace from Naugladur sleeping, the killing of Bodruith Lord of Belegost, and the fighting between the two clans of Dwarves. Naugladur was âblinded by the spellâ in taking so imprudent a course out of Artanor (p. 236); and the curse of MÃm is made the âcauseâ of his stumbling on a stone in his fight with Beren (p. 238). It is even, and most surprisingly, suggested as a reason for the short second lives of Beren and TinÃ¶viel (p. 240); and finally the spell of MÃ¶m is an element in the attack on Dior by the FÃ¶anorians (p. 241). An important element also in the tale is the baleful nature of the Nauglafring, for the Dwarves made it with bitterness; and into the complex of curses and spells is introduced also the dragon's ban upon the gold (p. 239) or the spell of the dragon (p. 241). It is not said in the Tale of Turambar that Glorund had cursed the gold or enspelled it; but MÃ¶m said to Arin (p. 114): "Has not Glorund lain long years upon it, and the evil of the drakes of Melko is on it, and no good can it bring to Man or Elf." Most notably, Gwendelin implies, against Beren's assertion that his holiness might overcome all such evils, that the Silmaril itself is unhallowed, since it abode in the Crown of Melko (p. 239). In the later of the two schemes for the Lost Tales (see I.107 note 3) it is said that the Nauglafring brought sickness to TinÃ¶viel.*

But however much the chief actors in this tale are enspelled or blindly carrying forward the mysterious dictates of a curse, there is no question but that the Dwarves in the original conception were altogether more ignoble than they afterwards became, more prone to evil to gain their ends, and more exclusively impelled by greed; that Doriath should be laid waste by mercenary Orcs under Dwarvish paymasters (p. 230) was to become incredible and impossible later. It is even said that by the deeds of Naugladur have the Dwarves been severed in feud for ever since those days with the Elves, and drawn more nigh in friendship to the kin of Melko (p. 230); and in the outlines for Gilfanon's Tale the Nauglath are an evil people, associates of goblins (I.236-7). In a rejected outline for the Tale of the Nauglafring (p. 136) the Necklace was made by certain Avanimor (Nautar or Nauglath), Avanimor being defined elsewhere as monsters, giants, and ogres. With all this compare The Lord of the Rings, Appendix F (I): "They [the Dwarves] are not evil by nature, and few ever served the Enemy of free will, whatever the tales of Men may have alleged."

The account of the Dwarves in this tale is of exceptional interest in other respects. The beards of the Indrafangs have been named in Tin^ovielâs âlengthening spellâ (pp. 19, 46); but this is the first description of the Dwarves in my fatherâs writingsâalready with the spelling that he maintained against the unceasing opposition of proof-readersâand they are eminently recognisable in their dour and hidden natures, in their âunlovelinessâ (The Silmarillion p. 113), and in their âmarvellous skill with metalsâ (ibid. p. 92). The strange statement that ânever comes a child among themâ is perhaps to be related to âthe foolish opinion among Menâ referred to in The Lord of the Rings, Appendix A (III), âthat there are no Dwarf-women, and that the Dwarves âgrow out of stoneâ.â In the same place it is said that âit is because of the fewness of women among them that the kind of the Dwarves increases slowlyâ.

It is also said in the tale that it is thought by some that the Dwarves âhave not heard of Il^oâvatarâ on knowledge of Il^oâvatar among Men see p. 209.

According to the Gnomish dictionary Indrafang was âa special name of the Longbeards or Dwarvesâ, but in the tale it is made quite plain that the Longbeards were on the contrary the Dwarves of Belegost; the Dwarves of Nogrod were the Nauglath, with their king Naugladur. It must be admitted however that the use of the terms is sometimes confusing, or confused: thus the description of the Nauglath on pp. 223â4 seems to be a description of all Dwarves, and to include the Indrafangs, though this cannot have been intended. The reference to âthe march of the Dwarves and Indrafangsâ (p. 234) must be taken as an ellipse, i.e. âthe Dwarves of Nogrod and the Indrafangsâ. Naugladur of Nogrod and Bodruith of Belegost are said to have been akin (p. 235), though this perhaps only means that they were both Dwarves whereas Ufedhin was an Elf.

The Dwarf-city of Nogrod is said in the tale to lie âa very long journey southward beyond the wide forest on the borders of those great heaths nigh Umboth-muilin the Pools of Twilight, on the marches of Tasarinanâ (p. 225). This could be interpreted to mean that Nogrod was itself âon the borders of those great heaths nigh Umboth-muilinâ but I think that this is out of the question. It would be a most improbable place for Dwarves, who âdwell beneath the earth in caves and tunnelled towns, and aforetime Nogrod was the mightiest of theseâ (p. 224). Though mountains are not specifically mentioned here in connection with Dwarves, I think it extremely likely that my father at this time conceived their cities to be in the mountains, as they were afterwards. Further, there seems nothing to contradict the view that the configuration of the lands in the Lost Tales was essentially similar to that of the earliest and later âSilmarillionâ maps; and on them, âa very long journey southwardâ is totally inappropriate to that between the Thousand Caves and the Pools of Twilight.

The meaning must therefore be, simply, âa very long journey southward beyond the wide forestâ, and what follows places the wide forest, not Nogrod; the forest being, in fact, the Forest of Artanor.

The Pools of Twilight are described in The Fall of Gondolin, but the Elvish name does not there appear (see pp. 195â6, 217).

Whether Belegost was near to or far from Nogrod is not made plain; it is said in this passage that the gold should be borne away âto Nogrod and the dwellings of the Dwarvesâ, but later (p. 230) the Indrafangs are âa kindred of the Dwarves that dwelt in other realmsâ.

In his association with the Dwarves Ufedhin is reminiscent of Eärl, Maeglinâs father, of whom it is said in The Silmarillion (p. 133) that âfor the Dwarves he had more liking than any other of the Elvenfolk of oldâ cf. ibid. p. 92: âFew of the Eldar went ever to Nogrod or Belegost, save Eärl of Nan Elmoth and Maeglin his son.â In the early forms of the story of Eärl and Isfin (referred to in The Fall of Gondolin, p. 165) Eärl has no association with Dwarves. In the present tale there is mention (p. 224) of âgreat trafficâ carried on by the Dwarves âwith the free Noldoliâ (with Melkoâs servants also) in those days: we may wonder who these free Noldoli were, since the Rodothlim had been destroyed, and Gondolin was hidden. Perhaps the sons of Fâanor are meant, or Egnor Berenâs father (see p. 65).

The idea that it was the Dwarves of Nogrod who were primarily involved survived into the later narrative, but they became exclusively so, and those of Belegost specifically denied all aid to them (The Silmarillion p. 233).

Â

Turning now to the Elves, Beren is here of course still an Elf

(see p. 139), and in his second span of life he is the ruler, in HithlumâHisilÃ³mÃ« of an Elvish people so numerous that ânot even Beren knew the tale of those myriad folkâ (p. 234); they are called âthe green Elvesâ and âthe brown Elves and the greenâ, for they were âclad in green and brownâ, and Dior ruled them in Hithlum after the final departure of Beren and TinÃ³viel. Who were they? It is far from clear how they are to be set into the conception of the Elves of the Great Lands as it appears in other Tales. We may compare the passage in The Coming of the Elves (I.118â19):

Long after the joy of Valinor had washed its memory faint [i.e., the memory of the journey through HisilÃ³mÃ«] the Elves sang still sadly of it, and told tales of many of their folk whom they said and say were lost in those old forests and ever wandered there in sorrow. Still were they there long after when Men were shut in HisilÃ³mÃ« by Melko, and still do they dance there when Men have wandered far over the lighter places of the Earth. HisilÃ³mÃ« did Men name Aryador, and the Lost Elves did they call the Shadow Folk, and feared them.

But in that tale the conception still was that Tinwelint ruled âthe scattered Elves of HisilomÃ«â, and in the outlines for Gilfanonâs Tale the âShadow Folkâ of HisilÃ³mÃ« had ceased to be Elves (see p. 64). In any case, the expression âgreen Elvesâ, coupled with the fact that it was the Green-elves of Ossiriand whom Beren led to the ambush of the Dwarves at Sarn Athrad in the later story (The Silmarillion p. 235), shows which Elvish people they were to become, even though there is as yet no trace of Ossiriand beyond the river Gelion and the story of the origin of the Laiquendi (ibid. pp. 94, 96).

It was inevitable that âthe land of the dead that liveâ should cease to be in HisilÃ³mÃ« (which seems to have been in danger of having too many inhabitants), and a note on the manuscript of the Tale of the Nauglafring says: âBeren must be in âDoriath beyond Sirionâ on ââ...not in Hithlum.â Doriath beyond Sirion was the region called in The Silmarillion (p. 122) Nivrim, the West March, the woods on the west bank of the river between the confluence of Teiglin and Sirion and Aelin-uial, the Meres of Twilight. In the Tale of TinÃ³viel Beren and TinÃ³viel, called

i. Cuilwarthon, âbecame mighty fairies in the lands about the north of Sirionâ (p. 41).

Gwendelin/Gwenniel appears a somewhat faint and ineffective figure by comparison with the Melian of The Silmarillion. Conceivably, an aspect of this is the far slighter protection afforded to the realm of Artanor by her magic than that of the impenetrable wall and deluding mazes of the Girdle of Melian (see p. 63). But the nature of the protection in the old conception is very unclear. In the Tale of the Nauglafring the coming of the Dwarves from Nogrod is only known when they approach the bridge before Tinwelintâs caves (p. 226); on the other hand, it is said (p. 230) that the âwoven magicâ of the queen was a defence against âmen of hostile heartâ, who could never make their way through the woods unless aided by treachery from within. Perhaps this provides an explanation of a sort of how the Dwarves bringing treasure from Nogrod were able to penetrate to the halls of Tinwelint without hindrance and apparently undetected (cf. also the coming of Ârinâs band in the Tale of Turambar, p. 114). In the event, the protective magic was easilyâtoo easilyâoverthrown by the simple device of a single treacherous Elf of Artanor who âoffered to lead the host through the magics of Gwendelinâ. This was evidently unsatisfactory; but I shall not enter further into this question here. Extraordinary difficulties of narrative structure were caused by this element of the inviolability of Doriath, as I hope to describe at a future date.

It might be thought that the story of the drowning of the treasure at the Stony Ford (falling into the waters of the river with the Dwarves who bore it) was evolved from that in the rejected conclusion of the Tale of Turambar (p. 136)âTinwelint âhearing that curse [set on the treasure by Ârin] caused the gold to be cast into a deep pool of the river before his doorsâ. In the Tale of the Nauglafring, however, Tinwelint, influenced by the queenâs foreboding words, still has the intention of doing this, but does not fulfil his intention (p. 223).

Â

The account of the second departure of Beren and TinÃviel (p. 240) raises again the extremely difficult question of the peculiar fate that was decreed for them by the edict of Mandos, which I have discussed on pp. 59â60. There I have suggested that the peculiar dispensation of Mandos in the case of Beren and Tin⁹viel as here conceived is therefore that their whole ânaturalâ destiny as Elves was changed: having died as Elves might die (from wounds or from grief) they were not reborn as new beings, but returned in their own personsâyet now âmortal even as Menâ.

Here however Tin⁹viel âfadedâ, and vanished in the woods; and Beren searched all Hithium and Artanor for her, until he too âfaded from lifeâ. Since this fading is here quite explicitly the mode in which âthat doom of mortality that Mandos had spokenâ came upon them (p. 240), it is very notable that it is likened to, and even it seems identified with, the fading of âthe Elves of later days throughout the worldââas though in the original idea Elvish fading was a form of mortality. This is in fact made explicit in a later version.

Â

The seven Sons of F³âanor, their oath (sworn not in Valinor but after the coming of the Noldoli to the Great Lands), and the maiming of Maidros appear in the outlines for Gilfanonâs Tale; and in the latest of these outlines the F³âanorians are placed in Dor L³min (= Hisil³m³â, Hithlum), see I.238, 240, 243. Here, in the Tale of the Nauglafring, appear for the first time the names of the Sons of F³âanor, five of them (Maidros, Maglor, Celegorm, Cranthor, Curufin) in the forms, or almost the forms, they were to retain, and Curufin already with his sobriquet âthe Craftyâ. The names Amrod and Amras in The Silmarillion were a late change; for long these two sons of F³âanor were Damrod (as here) and D³âriel (here Dinithel or Durithel, see Changes made to Names, p. 245).

Here also appear Dior the Fair, also called Ausir the Wealthy, and his daughter Elwing; his son Auredhir early disappeared in the development of the legends. But Dior ruled in âthe southern valesâ (p. 241) of Hisil³m³â, not in Artanor, and there is no suggestion of any renewal of Tinwelintâs kingdom after his death, in contrast to what was told later (The Silmarillion p. 236); moreover the F³âanorians, as noted above, dwelt also in Hisil³m³ââand how all this is to be related to what is said elsewhere of the inhabitants of that region I am unable to say: cf. the Tale of Tin⁹viel, p. 10: âHisil³m³â where dwelt Men, and thrall-Noldoli laboured, and few free-Eldar went.â

A very curious statement is made in this concluding part of the tale, that âthose were days of happiness in the vales of Hithlum, for there was peace with Melko and the Dwarves who had but one thought as they plotted against Gondolinâ (p. 241).

Presumably âpeace with Melkoâ means no more than that Melko had averted his attention from those lands; but nowhere else is there any reference to the Dwarvesâ plotting against Gondolin.

In the typescript version of the Tale of TinÃ^aviel (p. 43) it is said that if Turgon King of Gondolin was the most glorious of the kings of the Elves who defied Melko, âfor a while the most mighty and the longest free was Thingol of the Woodsâ. The most natural interpretation of this expression is surely that Gondolin fell before Artanor; whereas in The Silmarillion (p. 240) âTidings were brought by Thorondor Lord of Eagles of the fall of Nargothrond, and after of the slaying of Thingol and of Dior his heir, and of the ruin of Doriath; but Turgon shut his ear to word of the woes without.â In the present tale we see the same chronology, in that many of the Elves who followed Beren went after his departure to Gondolin, âthe rumour of whose growing power and glory ran in secret whispers among all the Elvesâ (p. 240), though here the destruction of Gondolin is said to have taken place on the very day that Dior was attacked by the Sons of FÃ«anor (p. 242). To evade the discrepancy therefore we must interpret the passage in the Tale of TinÃ^aviel to mean that Thingol remained free for a longer period of years than did Turgon, irrespective of the dates of their downfalls.

Lastly, the statements that CÃ«m an-Idrisaith, the Mound of Avarice, âstands there still in Artanorâ (p. 223), and that the waters of Aros still flow above the drowned hoard (p. 238), are noteworthy as indications that nothing analogous to the Drowning of Beleriand was present in the original conception.

V

THE TALE OF EÄRRENDËL

The true beginning of the Tale of Eärendel was to be the dwelling at Sirion's mouth of the Lothlim (the point at which The Fall of Gondolin ends: and fair among the Lothlim Eärendel grows in the house of his father, pp. 196-7) and the coming there of Elwing (the point at which the Tale of the Nauglafring ends: they departed for ever from the glades of Hithlum and got them to the south towards Sirion's deep waters, and the pleasant lands. And thus did all the fates of the fairies weave then to one strand, and that strand is the great tale of Eärendel; and to that tale's true beginning are we now come, p. 242). The matter is complicated, however, as will be seen in a moment, by my father's also making the Nauglafring the first part of the Tale of Eärendel.

But the great tale was never written; and for the story as he then conceived it we are wholly dependent on highly condensed and often contradictory outlines. There are also many isolated notes; and there are the very early Eärendel poems. While the poems can be precisely dated, the notes and outlines can not; and it does not seem possible to arrange them in order so as to provide a clear line of development.

One of the outlines for the Tale of Eärendel is the earlier of the two schemes for the Lost Tales which are the chief materials for Gilfanon's Tale; and I will repeat here what I said of this in the first part (I.233):

There is no doubt that [the earlier of the two schemes] was composed when the Lost Tales had reached their furthest point of development, as represented by the latest texts and arrangements given in this book. Now when this outline comes to the matter of Gilfanon's Tale it becomes at once very much fuller, but then contracts again to cursory references for the tales of TinÃ©viel, TÃ©rin, Tuor, and the Necklace of the Dwarves, and once more becomes fuller for the tale of EÃ©rendel.

This scheme B (as I will continue to call it) provides a coherent if very rough narrative plan, and divides the story into seven parts, of which the first (marked âToldâ) is âThe Nauglafring down to the flight of Elwingâ. This sevenfold division is referred to by Littleheart at the beginning of The Fall of Gondolin (p. 144):

It is a mighty tale, and seven times shall folk fare to the Tale-fire ere it be rightly told; and so twined is it with those stories of the Nauglafring and of the Elf-march that I would fain have aid in that tellingâ|

If the six parts following the Tale of the Nauglafring were each to be of comparable length, the whole Tale of EÃ©rendel would have been somewhere near half the length of all the tales that were in fact written; but my father never afterwards returned to it on any ample scale.

I give now the concluding part of Scheme B.

Tale of EÃ©rendel begins, with which is interwoven the Nauglafring and the March of the Elves. For further details see Notebook C.*

First part. The tale of the Nauglafring down to the flight of Elwing.

Second part. The dwelling at Sirion. Coming thither of Elwing, and the love of her and EÃ©rendel as girl and boy. Ageing of Tuorâhis secret sailing after the conches of Ulmo in Swanwing.

EÃ©rendel sets sail to the North to find Tuor, and if needs be Mandos.

Sails in EÃ©rÃ©mÃ©. Wrecked. Ulmo appears. Saves him, bidding him sail to KÃ©râfor for this hast thou been brought out of the Wrack of Gondolinâ.

Third part. Second attempt of EÃ©rendel to Mandos. Wreck of Falasquil and rescue by the Oarni.¹ He sights the Isle of Seabirds âwhither do all the birds of all waters come at whilesâ. Goes back by land to Sirion.

Idril has vanished (she set sail at night). The conches of Ulmo call EÃrendel. Last farewell of Elwing. Building of Wingilot.

Fourth part. EÃrendel sails for Valinor. His many wanderings, occupying several years.

Fifth part. Coming of the birds of Gondolin to KÃr with tidings. Uproar of the Elves. Councils of the Gods. March of the Inwir (death of InwÃ), Teleri, and Solosimpi.

Raid upon Sirion and captivity of Elwing.

Sorrow and wrath of Gods, and a veil dropped between Valmar and KÃr, for the Gods will not destroy it but cannot bear to look upon it.

Coming of the Eldar. Binding of Melko. Faring to Lonely Isle. Curse of the Nauglafring and death of Elwing.

Sixth part. EÃrendel reaches KÃr and finds it empty. Fares home in sorrow (and sights Tol EressÃa and the fleet of the Elves, but a great wind and darkness carries him away, and he misses his way and has a voyage eastward).

Arriving at length at Sirion finds it empty. Goes to the ruins of Gondolin. Hears of tidings. Sails to Tol EressÃa. Sails to the Isle of Seabirds.

Seventh part. His voyage to the firmament.

Written at the end of the text is: âRem[ainder] of Scheme in Notebook Câ. These references in Scheme B to âNotebook Câ are to the little pocket-book which goes back to 1916â17 but was used for notes and suggestions throughout the period of the Lost Tales (see I. 171). At the beginning of it there is an outline (here called âCâ) headed âEÃrendelâs Tale, Tuorâs sonâ, which is in fair harmony with Scheme B:

EÃrendel dwells with Tuor and IrildÃ² at Sirionâs mouth by the sea (on the Isles of Sirion). Elwing of the Gnomes of Artanor³ flees to them with the Nauglafring.

Eärendel and Elwing love one another as boy and girl.

Great love of Eärendel and Tuor. Tuor ages, and Ulmoâs conches far out west over the sea call him louder and louder, till one evening he sets sail in his twilit boat with purple sails, Swanwing, Alqarâlmâ«. ⁴ Idril sees him too late. Her song on the beach of Sirion.

When he does not return grief of Eärendel and Idril. Eärendel (urged also by Idril who is immortal) desires to set sail and search even to Mandos. [Marginal addition:] Curse of Nauglafring rests on his voyages. Ossâ« his enemy.

Fiord of the Mermaid. Wreck. Ulmo appears at wreck and saves them, telling them he must go to Kâ´r and is saved for that.

Elwingâs grief when she learns Ulmoâs bidding. âFor no man may tread the streets of Kâ´r or look upon the places of the Gods and dwell in the Outer Lands in peace again.â

Eärendel departs all the same and is wrecked by the treachery of Ossâ« and saved only by the Oarni (who love him) with Voronwâ« and dragged to Falasquill.

Eärendel makes his way back by land with Voronwâ«. Finds that Idril has vanished. ⁵ His grief. Prays to Ulmo and hears the conches. Ulmo bids him build a new and wonderful ship of the wood of Tuor from Falasquill. Building of Wingilot.

There are four items headed âAdditionsâ on this page of the notebook:

Building of Eärendelâlmâ« (Eaglepinion).

Noldoli add their pleading to Ulmoâs bidding.

Eärendel surveys the first dwelling of Tuor at Falasquill.

The voyage to Mandos and the Icy Seas.

The outline continues:

Voronwâ« and Eärendel set sail in Wingilot. Driven south. Dark regions. Fire mountains. Tree-men. Pygmies. Sarquindi or cannibalogres.

Driven west. Ungweliantâ«. Magic Isles. Twilit Isle [sic]. Littleheartâs gong awakes the Sleeper in the Tower of KÃ´r is found. Empty. EÃ´rendel reads tales and prophecies in the waters. Desolation of KÃ´r. EÃ´rendelâs shoes and self powdered with diamond dust so that they shine brightly.

Pearl.⁶

Homeward adventures. Driven eastâthe deserts and red palaces where dwells the Sun.⁷

Arrives at Sirion, only to find it sacked and empty. EÃ´rendel distraught wanders with VoronwÃ« and comes to the ruins of Gondolin. Men are encamped there miserably. Also Gnomes searching still for lost gems (or some Gnomes gone back to Gondolin).

Of the binding of Melko.⁸ The wars with Men and the departure to Tol EressÃ«a (the Eldar unable to endure the strife of the world). EÃ´rendel sails to Tol EressÃ«a and learns of the sinking of Elwing and the Nauglafring. Elwing became a seabird. His grief is very great. His garments and body shine like diamonds and his face is in silver flame for the grief andâ|â|.

He sets sail with VoronwÃ« and dwells on the Isle of Seabirds in the northern waters (not far from Falasquil)âand there hopes that Elwing will return among the seabirds, but she is seeking him wailing along all the shores and especially among wreckage.

After three times seven years he sails again for halls of Mandos with VoronwÃ«âhe gets there because [?only] those who stillâ|â|.and had suffered may do soâTuor is gone to Valinor and nought is known of Idril or of Elwing.

Reaches bar at margin of the world and sets sail on oceans of the firmament in order to gaze over the Earth. The Moon mariner chases him for his brightness and he dives through the Door of Night. How he cannot now return to the world or he will die.

He will find Elwing at the Faring Forth.

Tuor and Idril some say sail now in Swanwing and may be seen going swift down the wind at dawn and dusk.

The Co-events to EÃ´rendelâs Tale

Raid upon Sirion by Melko's Orcs and the captivity of Elwing.

Birds tell Elves of the Fall of Gondolin and the horrors of the fate of the Gnomes. Counsels of the Gods and uproar of the Elves. March of the Inwir and Teleri. The Solosimpi go forth also but fare along all the beaches of the world, for they are loth to fare far from the sound of the sea and only consent to go with the Teleri under these conditions for the Noldoli slew some of their kin at Kâ³pas.

This outline then goes on to the events after the coming of the Elves of Valinor into the Great Lands, which will be considered in the next chapter.

Though very much fuller, there seems to be little in C that is certainly contradictory to what is said in B, and there are elements in the latter that are absent from the former. In discussing these outlines I follow the divisions of the tale made in B.

Â

Second part. A little more is told in C of Tuor's departure from Sirion (in B there is no mention of Idril); and there appears the motive of Ossë's hostility to Eärendel and the curse of the Nauglafring as instrumental in his shipwrecks. The place of the first wreck is called the Fiord of the Mermaid. The word âthemâ rather than âhimâ in âUlmo saves them, telling them he must go to Kâ³râ is certain in the manuscript, which possibly suggests that Idril or Elwing (or both) were with Eärendel.

Â

Third part. In B Eärendel's second voyage, like the first, is explicitly an attempt to reach Mandos (seeking his father), whereas in C it seems that the second is undertaken rather in order to fulfil Ulmo's bidding that he sail to Kâ³r (to Elwing's grief). In C Voronwë is named as Eärendel's companion on the second voyage which ended at Falasquill; but the Isle of Seabirds is not mentioned at this point. In C Wingilot is built of the wood of Tuor from Falasquill in The Fall of Gondolin Tuor's wood was hewed for him by the Noldoli in the forests of Dor Lâ³min and floated down the hidden river (p. 152).

Â

Fourth part. Whereas B merely refers to Eärendel's many wanderings, occupying several years in his quest for Valinor, C gives some glimpses of what they were to be, as Wingilot was driven to the south and then into the west. The encounter with Ungweliant on the western voyage is curious; it is said in The Tale of the Sun and Moon that Melko held the North and Ungweliant the South (see I.182, 200).

In C we meet again the Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl (said to be Idril, though this was struck out, note 6) awakened by Littleheart's gong; cf. the account of Littleheart in The Cottage of Lost Play (I.15):

He sailed in Wingilot with Eärendel in that last voyage wherein they sought for Kôr. It was the ringing of this Gong on the Shadowy Seas that awoke the Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl that stands far out to west in the Twilit Isles.

In The Coming of the Valar it is said that the Twilit Isles float on the Shadowy Seas and the Tower of Pearl rises pale upon their most western cape (I.68; cf. I.125). But there is no other mention in C of Littleheart, Voronwë's son, as a companion of Eärendel, though he was named earlier in the outline, in a rejected phrase, as present at the Mouths of Sirion (see note 5), and in the Tale of the Nauglafring (p. 228) Ailios says that none still living have seen the Nauglafring's save only Littleheart son of Bronweg (where save only is an emendation from not even).

Â

Fifth and sixth parts. In C we meet the image of Eärendel's shoes shining from the dust of diamonds in Kôr, an image that was to survive (The Silmarillion p. 248):

He walked in the deserted ways of Tirion, and the dust upon his raiment and his shoes was a dust of diamonds, and he shone and glistened as he climbed the long white stairs.

But in The Silmarillion Tirion was deserted because it was a time of festival, and wellnigh all the Elvenfolk were gone to Valimar, or were gathered in the halls of Manwë upon Taniquetil here on the other hand it seems at least strongly implied, in both B and C, that Kôr was empty because the Elves of Valinor had departed into the Great Lands, as a result of the tidings brought by the birds of Gondolin. In these very early narrative schemes there is no mention of Eärendelâs speaking to the Valar, as the ambassador of Elves and Men (The Silmarillion p. 249), and we can only conclude, extraordinary as the conclusion is, that Eärendelâs great western voyage, though he attained his goal, was fruitless, that he was not the agent of the aid that did indeed come out of Valinor to the Elves of the Great Lands, and (most curious of all) that Ulmoâs designs for Tuor had no issue. In fact, my father actually wrote in the 1930 version of The Silmarillion:

Thus it was that the many emissaries of the Gnomes in after days came never back to Valinorâsave one: and he came too late.

The words and he came too late were changed to the mightiest mariner of song, and this is the phrase that is found in The Silmarillion, p. 102. It is unfortunately never made clear in the earliest writings what was Ulmoâs purpose in bidding Eärendel sail to Kôr, for which he had been saved from the ruin of Gondolin. What would he have achieved, had he come to Kôr in time, more than in the event did take place after the coming of tidings from Gondolinâthe March of the Elves into the Great Lands? In a curious note in C, not associated with the present outline, my father asked: How did King Turgonâs messengers get to Valinor or gain the Godsâ consent? and answered: His messengers never got there. Ulmo [sic] but the birds brought tidings to the Elves of the fate of Gondolin (the doves and pigeons of Turgon) and they [arm and march away].

The coming of the message was followed by the councils (counsels C) of the Gods and the uproar of the Elves, but in C nothing is said of the sorrow and wrath of the Gods or the veil dropped between Valmar and Kôr referred to in B: where the meaning can surely only be that the March of the Elves from Valinor was undertaken in direct opposition to the will of the Valar, that the Valar were bitterly opposed to the intervention of the Elves of Valinor in the affairs of the Great Lands. There may well be a connection here with Vairi's words (I. 19): "When the fairies left Kôr that lane [i.e. Olórë Mallë that led past the Cottage of Lost Play] was blocked for ever with great impassable rocks". Elsewhere there is only one other reference to the effect of the message from across the sea, and that is in the words of Lindo to Eriol in The Cottage of Lost Play (I.16):

Inwë, whom the Gnomes call Inwithiel was King of all the Eldar when they dwelt in Kôr. That was in the days before hearing the lament of the world [i.e. the Great Lands] Inwë led them forth to the lands of Men.

Later, Meril-i-Turinqi told Eriol (I.129) that Inwë, her grandsire's sire, perished in that march into the world, but Ingil his son went long ago back to Valinor and is with Manwë and there is a reference to Inwë's death in B.

In C the Solosimpi only agreed to accompany the expedition on condition that they remain by the sea, and the reluctance of the Third Kindred, on account of the Kinslaying at Swanhaven, survived (The Silmarillion p. 251). But there is no suggestion that the Elves of Valinor were transported by ship, indeed the reverse, for the Solosimpi fare along all the beaches of the world, and the expedition is a March though there is no indication of how they came to the Great Lands.

Both outlines refer to Eärendel being driven eastwards on his homeward voyage from Kôr, and to his finding the dwellings at Sirion's mouth ravaged when he finally returned there; but B does not say who carried out the sack and captured Elwing. In C it was a raid by Orcs of Melko; cf. the entry in the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin (p. 215): "Egalthô got even out of the burning of Gondolin, and dwelt after at the mouth of Sirion, but was slain in a dire battle there when Melko seized Elwingâ.

Neither outline refers to Elwing's escape from captivity. Both mention Eärendel's going back to the ruins of Gondolin in C he returns there with Voronwë and finds Men and Gnomes; another entry in the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin (p. 215) bears on this: "Galdor won out of Gondolin and even the onslaught of Melko upon the dwellers at Sirion's mouth and went back to the ruins with Eärendel.

Both outlines mention the departure of the Elves from the Great Lands, after the binding of Melko, to Tol Eressëa, C adding a reference to the wars with Men and to the Eldar being unable to endure the strife of the world, and both refer to Eärendel's going there subsequently, but the order of events seems to be different: in B Eärendel on his way back from Kôr sights Tol Eressëa and the fleet of the Elves (presumably the fleet returning from the Great Lands), whereas in C the departure of the Elves is not mentioned until after Eärendel's return to Sirion. But the nature of these outlines is not conveyed in print: they were written at great speed, catching fugitive thoughts, and cannot be pressed hard. However, with the fate of Elwing B and C seem clearly to part company: in B there is a simple reference to her death, apparently associated with the curse of the Nauglafring, and from the order in which the events are set down it may be surmised that her death took place on the journey to Tol Eressëa; C specifically refers to the sinking of Elwing and the Nauglafring but says that Elwing became a seabird, an idea that survived (The Silmarillion p. 247). This perhaps gives more point to Eärendel's going to the Isle of Seabirds, mentioned in both B and C: in the latter he hopes that Elwing will return among the seabirds.

Â

Seventh part. In B the concluding part of the tale is merely summarised in the words "His voyage to the firmament", with a reference to the other outline C, and in the latter we get some glimpses of a narrative. It seems to be suggested that the brightness of Eärendel (quite unconnected with the Silmaril) arose from the diamond dust of Kôr, but also in some sense from the exaltation of his grief. An isolated jotting elsewhere in C asks: "What became of the Silmarils after the capture of Melko?" My father at this time gave no answer to the question; but the question is itself a testimony to the relatively minor importance of the jewels of Fëanor, if also, perhaps, a sign of his awareness that they would not always remain so, that in them lay a central meaning of the mythology, yet to be discovered.

It seems too that Eärendel sailed into the sky in continuing search for Elwing (âhe sets sail on the oceans of the firmament in order to gaze over the Earthâ); and that his passing through the Door of Night (the entrance made by the Gods in the Wall of Things in the West, see I.215â16) did not come about through any devising, but because he was hunted by the Moon. With this last idea, cf. I.193, where Ilinsor, steersman of the Moon, is said to âhunt the starsâ.

Â

The later of the two schemes for the Lost Tales, which gives a quite substantial outline for Gilfanonâs Tale, where I have called it âDâ (see I.234), here fails us, for the concluding passage is very condensed, in part erased, and ends abruptly early in the Tale of EÂœrendel. I give it here, beginning at a slightly earlier point in the narrative:

Of the death of Tinwelint and the flight of Gwenethlin see [p. 51]. How Beren avenged Tinwelint and how the Necklace became his. How it brought sickness to TinÂœviel see [p. 246], and how Beren and TinÂœviel faded from the Earth. How their sons [sic] dwelt after them and how the sons of FÂ«anor came up against them with a host because of the Silmaril. How all were slain but Elwing daughter of Daimord see [p. 139] son of Beren fled with the Necklace.

Of Tuorâs vessel with white sails.

How folk of the Lothlim dwelt at Sirionâs Mouth. EÂœrendel grew fairest of all Men that were or are. How the mermaids \(Oarni\) loved him. How Elwing came to the Lothlim and of the love of Elwing and EÂœrendel. How Tuor fell into age, and how Ulmo beckoned to him at eve, and he set forth on the waters and was lost. How Idril swam after him.

(In the following passage my father seems at first to have written: âEÂœrendelâ|â|.. Oarni builded Wingilot and set forth in search ofâ|.leaving VoronwÂ« with Elwingâ, where the first lacuna perhaps said âwith the aid ofâ, though nothing is now visible; but then he wrote âEÂœrendel built Swanwingâ, and then partly erased the passage: it is impossible to see now what his intention was.)

Elwing's lament. How Ulmo forbade his quest but Eärendel would yet sail to find a passage to Mandos. How Wingilot was wrecked at Falasquil and how Eärendel found the carven house of Tuor there.

Here Scheme D ends. There is also a reference at an earlier point in it to the messengers sent from Gondolin. The doves of Gondolin fly to Valinor at the fall of that town.

This outline seems to show a move to reduce the complexity of the narrative, with Wingilot being the ship in which Eärendel attempted to sail to Mandos and in which he was wrecked at Falasquil; but the outline is too brief and stops too soon to allow any certain conclusions to be drawn.

Â

A fourth outline, which I will call 'A', is found on a detached sheet; in this Tuor is called Târ (see p. 148).

Fall of Gondolin. The feast of Glorfindel. The dwelling by the waters of Sirion's mouth. The mermaids come to Eärendel.

Târ groweth sea-hungry his song to Eärendel. One evening he calls Eärendel and they go to the shore. There is a skiff. Târ bids farewell to Eärendel and bids him thrust it off the skiff fares away into the West. Eärendel hears a great song swelling from the sea as Târ's skiff dips over the world's rim. His passion of tears upon the shore. The lament of Idril.

The building of Earum.⁹ The coming of Elwing. Eärendel's reluctance. The whetting of Idril. The voyage and foundering of Earum in the North, and the vanishing of Idril. How the seamaiads rescued Eärendel, and brought him to Târ's bay. His coastwise journey.

The rape of Elwing. Eärendel discovers the ravaging of Sirion's mouth.

The building of Wingilot. He searches for Elwing and is blown far to the South. Wiril³m. He escapes eastward. He goes back westward; he descries the Bay of Faery. The Tower of Pearl, the magic isles, the great shadows. He finds Kôr empty; he sails back, crusted with dust and his face afire. He learns of Elwingâs foundering. He sitteth on the Isle of Seabirds. Elwing as a seamew comes to him. He sets sail over the margent of the world.

Apart from the fuller account of Tuorâs departure from the mouths of Sirion, not much can be learned from thisâit is too condensed. But even allowing for speed and compression, there seem to be essential differences from B and C. Thus in this outline (E) Elwing, as it appears, comes to Sirion at a later point in the story, after the departure of Tuor; but the raid and capture of Elwing seems to take place at an earlier point, while EÃœrendel is on his way back to Sirion from his shipwreck in the North (not, as in B and C, while he is on the great voyage in Wingilot that took him to KÃœr). Here, it seems, there was to be only one northward journey, ending in the shipwreck of EarÃœmÃœ/Earum near Falasquil. Though it cannot be demonstrated, I incline to think that E was subsequent to B and C: partly because the reduction of two northward voyages ending in shipwreck to one seems more likely than the other way about, and partly because of the form TÃœr, which, though it did not survive, replaced Tuor for a time (p. 148).

One or two other points may be noticed in this outline. The great spider, called UngweliantÃœ in C but here WirilÃœmÃœ (âGloomweaverâ, see I.152), is here encountered by EÃœrendel in the far South, not as in C on his westward voyage: see p. 256. Elwing in this version comes to EÃœrendel as a seabird (as she does in The Silmarillion, p. 247), which is not said in C and even seems to be denied.

Ã

Another isolated page (associated with the poem âThe Bidding of the Minstrelâ, see pp. 269â70 below) gives a very curious account of EÃœrendelâs great voyage:

EÃœrendelâs boat goes through North. Iceland. [Added in margin: back of North Wind.] Greenland, and the wild islands: a mighty wind and crest of great wave carry him to hotter climes, to back of West Wind. Land of strange men, land of magic. The home of Night. The Spider. He escapes from the meshes of Night with a few comrades, sees a great mountain island and a golden city [added in margin: KÃ´r]âwind blows him southward. Tree-men, Sun-dwellers, spices, fire-mountains, red sea: Mediterranean (loses his boat (travels afoot through wilds of Europe?)) or Atlantic.* Home. Waxes aged. Has a new boat builded. Bids adieu to his north land. Sails west again to the lip of the world, just as the Sun is diving into the sea. He sets sail upon the sky and returns no more to earth.

Â

The golden city was KÃ´r and he had caught the music of the SolosimpÃ«, and returns to find it, only to find that the fairies have departed from Eldamar. See little book. Dusted with diamond dust climbing the deserted streets of KÃ´r.

One would certainly suppose this account to be earlier than anything so far considered (both from the fact that EÃrendelâs history after his return from the great voyage seems to bear no relation to that in B and C, and from his voyage being set in the lands and oceans of the known world), were it not for the reference to the âlittle bookâ, which must mean âNotebook Câ, from which the outline C above is taken (see p. 254). But I think it very probable (and the appearance of the MS rather supports this) that the last paragraph (âThe golden city. was KÃ´râ) was added later, and that the rest of the outline belongs with the earliest writing of the poem, in the winter of 1914.

It is notable that only here in the earliest writings is it made clear that the âdiamond dustâ that coated EÃrendel came from the streets of KÃ´r (cf. the passage from The Silmarillion cited on p. 257).

Another of the early EÃrendel poems, âThe Shores of FaÃryâ, has a short prose preface, which if not as old as the first composition of the poem itself (July 1915, see p. 271) is certainly not much later:

EÃrendel the Wanderer who beat about the Oceans of the World in his white ship Wingelot sat long while in his old age upon the Isle of Seabirds in the Northern Waters ere he set forth upon a last voyage.

He passed Taniquetil and even Valinor, and drew his bark over the bar at the margin of the world, and launched it on the Oceans of the Firmament. Of his ventures there no man has told, save that hunted by the orbéd Moon he fled back to Valinor, and mounting the towers of KÃ´r upon the rocks of Eglamar he gazed back upon the Oceans of the World. To Eglamar he comes ever at plenilune when the Moon sails a-harrying beyond Taniquetil and Valinor.*

Both here and in the outline associated with âThe Bidding of the Minstrelâ EÃrendel was conceived to be an old man when he journeyed into the firmament.

Â

No other âconnectedâ account of the Tale of EÃrendel exists from the earliest period. There are however a number of separate notes, mostly in the form of single sentences, some found in the little notebook C, others jotted down on slips. I collect these references here more or less in the sequence of the tale.

(i) âDwelling in the Isle of Sirion in a house of snow-white stone.ââIn C (p. 254) it is said that EÃrendel dwelt with Tuor and Idril at Sirionâs mouth by the sea âon the Isles of Sirionâ.

(ii) âThe Oarni give to EÃrendel a wonderful shining silver coat that wets not. They love EÃrendel, in OssÃâs despite, and teach him the lore of boat-building and of swimming, as he plays with them about the shores of Sirion.ââIn the outlines are found references to the love of the Oarni for EÃrendel (D, p. 259), the coming of the mermaids to him (E, p. 260), and to OssÃâs enmity \(C, p. 254\).

(iii) EÃrendel was smaller than most men but nimble-footed and a swift swimmer (but VoronwÃ could not swim).

(iv) âIdril and EÃrendel see Tuorâs boat dropping into the twilight and a sound of song.ââIn B Tuorâs sailing is âsecretâ (p. 253), in C âIdril sees him too lateâ (p. 254), and in E EÃrendel is present at Tuorâs departure and thrusts the boat out: âhe hears a great song swelling from the seaâ (p. 260).

(v) âDeath of Idril?ââfollows secretly after Tuor.ââThat Idril died is denied in C: âTuor and Idril some say sail now in Swanwingâ (p. 255); in D Idril swam after him (p. 260).

(vi) âTuor has sailed back to Falasquil and so back up Ilbranteloth to Asgon where he sits playing on his lonely harp on the islanded rock.âThis is marked with a query and an âXâ implying rejection of the idea. There are curious references to the âislanded rockâ in Asgon in the outlines for Gilfanonâs Tale (see I.238).

(vii) âThe fiord of the Mermaid: enchantment of his sailors. Mermaids are not Oarni (but are earthlings, or fays?âor both).âIn D (p. 259) Mermaids and Oarni are equated.

(viii) The ship Wingilot was built of wood from Falasquil with âaid of the Oarniâ.âThis was probably said also in D: see p. 260.

(ix) Wingilot was âshaped as a swan of pearlsâ.

(x) âThe doves and pigeons of Turgonâs courtyard bring message to Valinorâonly to Elves.âOther references to the birds that flew from Gondolin also say that they came to the Elves, or to KÃ´r (pp. 253, 255, 257).

(xi) âDuring his voyages EÃrendel sights the white walls of KÃ´r gleaming afar off, but is carried away by OssÃas adverse winds and waves.âThe same is said in B (p. 253) of EÃrendelâs sighting of Tol EresseÃa on his homeward voyage from KÃ´r.

(xii) âThe Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl awakened by Littleheartâs gong: a messenger that was despatched years ago by Turgon and enmeshed in magics. Even now he cannot leave the Tower and warns them of the magic.âIn C there is a statement, rejected, that the Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl was Idril herself (see note 6).

(xiii) âUlmoâs protection removed from Sirion in wrath at EÃrendelâs second attempt to Mandos, and hence Melko overwhelmed it.âThis note is struck through, with an âXâ written against it; but in D (p. 260) it is said that âUlmo forbade his quest but EÃrendel would yet sail to find a passage to Mandosâ. The meaning of this must be that it was contrary to Ulmoâs purpose that EÃrendel should seek to Mandos for his father, but must rather attempt to reach KÃ´r.

(xiv) âEÃrendel weds Elwing before he sets sail. When he hears of her loss he says that his children shall be âall such men hereafter as dare the great seas in shipsâ.âWith this cf. The Cottage of Lost Play (I.13): âeven such a son of EÃrendel as was this wayfarerâ, and (I.18): âa man of great and excellent travel, a son meseems of Eärendel. In an outline of Eriol's life (I.24) it is said that he was a son of Eärendel, born under his beam, and that if a beam from Eärendel fall on a child newborn he becomes a child of Eärendel and a wanderer. In the early dictionary of Qenya there is an entry: Eärendilyon a son of Eärendel (used of any mariner) (I.251).

(xv) Eärendel goes even to the empty Halls of Iron seeking Elwing. Eärendel must have gone to Angamandi (empty after the defeat of Melko) at the same time as he went to the ruins of Gondolin (pp. 253, 255).

(xvi) The loss of the ship carrying Elwing and the Nauglafring took place on the voyage to Tol Eressëa with the exodus of the Elves from the Great Lands. See my remarks, pp. 258-9. For the appeasing of Mairon's curse by the drowning of the Nauglafring see the Appendix on Names, entry Nauglafring. The departure of the Elves to Tol Eressëa is discussed in the next chapter (p. 280).

(xvii) Eärendel and the northern tower on the Isle of Seabirds. In C (p. 255) Eärendel sets sail with Voronwë and dwells on the Isle of Seabirds in the northern waters (not far from Falasquill) and there hopes that Elwing will return among the seabirds in B (p. 253) he sights the Isle of Seabirds whither do all the birds of all waters come at whiles. There is a memory of this in The Silmarillion, p. 250: "Therefore there was built for [Elwing] a white tower northward upon the borders of the Sundering Seas; and thither at times all the seabirds of the earth repaired."

(xviii) When Eärendel comes to Mandos he finds that Tuor is not in Valinor, nor Erumäni, and neither Elves nor Ainu know where he is. (He is with Ulmo.) In C (p. 255) Eärendel, reaching the Halls of Mandos, learns that Tuor is gone to Valinor. For the possibility that Tuor might be in Erumäni or Valinor see I.91 ff.

(xix) Eärendel returns from the firmament ever and anon with Voronwë to Kôr to see if the Magic Sun has been lit and the fairies have come back but the Moon drives him back. On Eärendel's return from the firmament see (xxi) below; on the Rekindling of the Magic Sun see p. 286.

Two statements about Eärendel cited previously may be added here:

(xx) In the tale of The Theft of Melko (I.141) it is said that on the walls of Kôr were many dark tales written in pictured symbols, and runes of great beauty were drawn there too or carved upon stones, and Eärendel read many a wondrous tale there long ago.

(xxi) The Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin has the following entry (cited on p. 215): Eärendel was the son of Tuor and Idril and is said the only being that is half of the kindred of the Eldali and half of Men. He was the greatest and first of all mariners among Men, and saw regions that Men have not yet found nor gazed upon for all the multitude of their boats. He rideth now with Voronwë upon the winds of the firmament nor comes ever further back than Kôr, else would he die like other Men, so much of the mortal is in him. In the outline associated with the poem The Bidding of the Minstrel Eärendel sets sail upon the sky and returns no more to earth (p. 261); in the prose preface to The Shores of Faery to Eglamar he comes ever at plenilune when the Moon sails-a-harrying beyond Taniquetil and Valinor (p. 262); in outline C he cannot now return to the world or he will die (p. 255); and in citation (xix) above he returns from the firmament ever and anon with Voronwë to Kôr.

In The Silmarillion (p. 249) Manwë's judgement was that Eärendel and Elwing shall not walk ever again among Elves or Men in the Outer Lands but it is also said that Eärendel returned to Valinor from his voyages beyond the confines of the world (ibid. p. 250), just as it is said in the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin that he does not come ever further back than Kôr. The further statement in the Name-list, that if he did he would die like other Men, so much of the mortal is in him, was in some sense echoed long after in a letter of my father's written in 1967: Eärendil, being in part descended from Men, was not allowed to set foot on Earth again, and became a star shining with the light of the Silmaril (The Letters of J. R. R. Tolkien no. 297).

A

This brings to an end all the prose materials that bear on the earliest form of the Tale of Eärendel (apart from a few other references to him that appear in the next chapter). With these outlines and notes we are at a very early stage of composition, when the conceptions were fluid and had not been given even preliminary narrative form: the myth was present in certain images that were to endure, but these images had not been articulated.

I have already noticed (p. 257) the remarkable fact that there is no hint of the idea that it was Eärendel who by his intercession brought aid out of the West; equally there is no suggestion that the Valar hallowed his ship and set him in the sky, nor that his light was that of the Silmaril. Nonetheless there were already present the coming of Eärendel to Kôr (Tirion) and finding it deserted, the dust of diamonds on his shoes, the changing of Elwing into a seabird, the passing of his ship through the Door of Night, and the sanction against his return to the lands east of the Sea. The raid on the Havens of Sirion appears in the early outlines, though that was an act of Melkoas, not of the Fëanorians; and Tuor's departure also, but without Idril, whom he left behind. His ship was Alqarjâlmâ, Swanwing: afterwards it bore the name Eärrjâlmâ, with the meaning 'Sea-wing' (The Silmarillion p. 245), which retained, in form but not in meaning, the name of Eärendel's first ship Eärjâlmâ (Eaglepinion) (pp. 253-4, and see note 9).

It is interesting to read my father's statement, made some half-century later (in the letter of 1967 referred to above), concerning the origins of Eärendil:

This name is in fact (as is obvious) derived from Anglo-Saxon Ærendel. When first studying Anglo-Saxon professionally (1913) I had done so as a boyish hobby when supposed to be learning Greek and Latin I was struck by the great beauty of this word (or name), entirely coherent with the normal style of Anglo-Saxon, but euphonic to a peculiar degree in that pleasing but not 'delectable' language. Also its form strongly suggests that it is in origin a proper name and not a common noun. This is borne out by the obviously related forms in other Germanic languages; from which amid the confusions and debasements of late traditions it at least seems certain that it belonged to astronomical-myth, and was the name of a star or star-group. To my mind the Anglo-Saxon uses seem plainly to indicate that it was a star presaging the dawn (at any rate in English tradition): that is what we now call Venus: the morning star as it may be seen shining brilliantly in the dawn, before the actual rising of the Sun. That is at any rate how I took it. Before 1914 I wrote a poem upon Eärendil who launched his ship like a bright spark from the havens of the Sun. I adopted him into my mythology in which he became a prime figure as a mariner, and eventually as a herald star, and a sign of hope to men. Aiyá Eärendil Elenion Ancalima ([The Lord of the Rings] II.329), hail Eärendil brightest of Stars is derived at long remove from Ālā; Āarendel engla beorhtast.^{*} But the name could not be adopted just like that: it had to be accommodated to the Elvish linguistic situation, at the same time as a place for this person was made in legend. From this, far back in the history of Elvish, which was beginning, after many tentative starts in boyhood, to take definite shape at the time of the name's adoption, arose eventually (a) the Common Elvish stem AYAR āsea, primarily applied to the Great Sea of the West, lying between Middle-earth and Aman the Blessed Realm of the Valar; and (b) the element, or verbal base (N) DIL, to love, be devoted to describing the attitude of one to a person, thing, cause, or occupation to which one is devoted for its own sake. Eärendil became a character in the earliest written (1916-17) of the major legends: The Fall of Gondolin, the greatest of the Pereldar Half-elven, son of Tuor of the most renowned House of the Edain, and Idril daughter of the King of Gondolin.

My father did not indeed here say that his Eärendil contained from the beginning elements that in combination give a meaning like Sea-lover but it is in any case clear that at the time of the earliest extant writings on the subject the name was associated with an Elvish word ea ēagle see p. 265 on the name of Eärendil's first ship Eärendil ēaglepinion. In the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin this is made explicit: Earendil [sic] though belike it hath some kinship to the Elfin ea and earen ēagle and âeyrieâ (wherefore cometh to mind the passage of Cristhorn and the use of the sign of the Eagle by Idril [see p. 193]) is thought to be woven of that secret tongue of the Gondothlim [see p. 165].â

Â

I give lastly four early poems of my fatherâs in which EÃ ðrendel appears.

I

ÃalÃ; Ãarendel Engla Beorhtast

There can be little doubt that, as Humphrey Carpenter supposes (Biography p. 71), this was the first poem on the subject of EÃ ðrendel that my father composed, and that it was written at Phoenix Farm, Gedling, Nottinghamshire, in September 1914.¹⁰ It was to this poem that he was referring in the letter of 1967 just citedâI wrote a âpoemâ upon EÃðrendel who launched his ship like a bright sparkâ: cf. line 5 âHe launched his bark like a silver sparkââ

There are some five different versions, each one incorporating emendations made in the predecessor, though only the first verse was substantially rewritten. The title was originally âThe Voyage of Åarendel the Evening Starâ, together with (as customarily) an Old English version of this: ScipfÃ|reld Earendeles Æfensteorran; this was changed in a later copy to ÃalÃ; Ãarendel Engla Beorhtast âThe Last Voyage of EÃðrendelâ, and in still later copies the modern English name was removed. I give it here in the last version, the date of which cannot be determined, though the handwriting shows it to be substantially later than the original composition; together with all the divergent readings of the earliest extant version in footnotes.

Ãarendel arose where the shadow flows
At Oceanâs silent brim;
Through the mouth of night as a ray of light
Where the shores are sheer and dimÂ Â Â Â Â Â 4
He launched his bark like a silver spark
From the last and lonely sand;
Then on sunlit breath of dayâs fiery death

He sailed from Westerland. 8

He threaded his path o'er the aftermath
Of the splendour of the Sun,
And wandered far past many a star
In his gleaming galleon. 12
On the gathering tide of darkness ride
The argosies of the sky,
And spangle the night with their sails of light
As the streaming star goes by. 16

Unheeding he dips past these twinkling ships,
By his wayward spirit whirled
On an endless quest through the darkling West
O'er the margin of the world; 20
And he fares in haste o'er the jewelled waste
And the dusk from whence he came
With his heart afire with bright desire
And his face in silver flame. 24

The Ship of the Moon from the East comes soon
From the Haven of the Sun,
Whose white gates gleam in the coming beam
Of the mighty silver one. 28
Lo! with bellying clouds as his vessel's shrouds
He weighs anchor down the dark,
And on shimmering oars leaves the blazing shores
In his argent-timbered bark. 32

Readings of the earliest version:

188 The Ærendel sprang up from the Ocean's cup
In the gloom of the mid-world's rim;
From the door of Night as a ray of light
Leapt over the twilight brim,
And launching his bark like a silver spark
From the golden-fading sand
Down the sunlit breath of Day's fiery Death
He sped from Westerland.

10 splendour] glory
 11 wandered] went wandering
 16 streaming] Evening
 17 Unheeding] But unheeding
 18 wayward] wandering
 19 endless] magic darkling] darkening
 20 Oâer the margin] Toward the margent
 22 And the dusk] To the dusk
 25 The Ship] For the Ship
 31 blazing] skiey
 32 timbered] orbÃ©d

Then Ãarendel fled from that Shipman dread
 Beyond the dark earthâs pale,
 Back under the rim of the Ocean dim,
 And behind the world set sail;Â Â Â Â Â 36
 And he heard the mirth of the folk of earth
 And the falling of their tears,
 As the world dropped back in a cloudy wrack
 On its journey down the years.Â Â Â Â Â 40

Then he glimmering passed to the starless vast
 As an islÃ©d lamp at sea,
 And beyond the ken of mortal men
 Set his lonely errantry,Â Â Â Â Â 44
 Tracking the Sun in his galleon
 Through the pathless firmament,
 Till his light grew old in abysses cold
 And his eager flame was spent.Â Â Â Â Â 48

There seems every reason to think that this poem preceded all the outlines and notes given in this chapter, and that verbal similarities to the poem found in these are echoes (e.g. âhis face is in silver flameâ, outline C, p. 255; âthe margent of the worldâ, outline E, p. 260).

In the fourth verse of the poem the Ship of the Moon comes forth from the Haven of the Sun; in the tale of The Hiding of Valinor (I.215) AulÃ« and Ulmo built two havens in the east, that of the Sun (which was âwide and goldenâ) and that of the Moon

(which was âwhite, having gates of silver and of pearlâ)âbut they were both âwithin the same harbourageâ. As in the poem, in the Tale of the Sun and Moon the Moon is urged on by âshimmering oarsâ (I. 195).

II

The Bidding of the Minstrel

This poem, according to a note that my father scribbled on one of the copies, was written at St. Johnâs Street, Oxford (see I.27) in the winter of 1914; there is no other evidence for its date. In this case the earliest workings are extant, and on the back of one of the sheets is the outline account of Eärendelâs great voyage given on p. 261. The poem was then much longer than it became, but the workings are exceedingly rough; they have no title. To the earliest finished text a title was added hastily later: this apparently reads âThe Minstrel renounces the songâ. The title then became âThe Lay of Eärendelâ, changed in the latest text to âThe Bidding of the Minstrel, from the Lay of Eärendelâ.

Â

33 Then] And

38 And the falling of] And hearkened to

Â

46â8 And voyaging the skies

Till his splendour was shorn by the birth of Morn

And he died with the Dawn in his eyes.

Â

There are four versions following the original rough draft, but the changes made in them were slight, and I give the poem here in the latest form, noting only that originally the minstrel seems to have responded to the âbiddingâ much earlierâat line 5, which read âThen harkenâa tale of immortal sea-yearningâ; and that âEldarâ in line 6 and âElvenâ in line 23 are emendations, made on the latest text, of âfairiesâ, âfairÿâ.

âSing us yet more of Eärendel the wandering,
Chant us a lay of his white-oared ship,
More marvellous-cunning than mortal manâs pondering,

 Foamily musical out on the deep.
 Sing us a tale of immortal sea-yearning 5
The Eldar once made ere the change of the light, Weaving a winelike spell, and a burning
 Wonder of spray and the odours of night;
 Of murmurous gloamings out on far oceans;
 Of his tossing at anchor off islets forlorn 10
 To the unsleeping wavesâ never-ending sea-motions;
 Of bellying sails when a wind was born,
 And the gurgling bubble of tropical water
 Tinkled from under the ringâd stem,
 And thousands of miles was his ship from those wrought her 15
 A petrel, a sea-bird, a white-wingâd gem,
 Gallantly bent on measureless faring
 Ere she came homing in sea-laden flight,
 Circuitous, lingering, restlessly daring, Coming to haven unlooked for, at night. 20

âBut the music is broken, the words half-forgotten,
 The sunlight has faded, the moon is grown old,
The Elven ships foundered or weed-swathed and rotten,
 The fire and the wonder of hearts is acold.
 Who now can tell, and what harp can accompany 25
 With melodies strange enough, rich enough tunes,
 Pale with the magic of cavernous harmony,
 Loud with shore-music of beaches and dunes,
 How slender his boat; of what glimmering timber;
 How her sails were all silvern and taper her mast, 30
 And silver her throat with foam and her limber
 Flanks as she swanlike floated past!

The song I can sing is but shreds one remembers
 Of golden imaginings fashioned in sleep,

A whispered tale told by the withering embers 35
Of old things far off that but few hearts keep.

III

The Shores of Faëry

This poem is given in its earliest form by Humphrey Carpenter, Biography, pp. 76-7.¹¹ It exists in four versions each as usual incorporating slight changes; my father wrote the date of its composition on three of the copies, viz. July 8-9, 1915; Moseley and Edgbaston, Birmingham July 1915 (walking and on bus). Retouched often since esp. 1924 and First poem of my mythology, Valinor, 1910. This last cannot have been intended for the date of composition, and the illegible words preceding it may possibly be read as thought of about. But it does not in any case appear to have been the first poem of the mythology: that, I believe, was Álþjárendel Engla Beorhtast and my father's mention of this poem in his letter of 1967 (see p. 266) seems to suggest this also.

The Old English title was Ielfalandes Strand (The Shores of Elfland). It is preceded by a short prose preface which has been given above, p. 262. I give it here in the latest version (undateable), with all readings from the earliest in footnotes.

East of the Moon, west of the Sun
There stands a lonely hill;
Its feet are in the pale green sea,
Its towers are white and still,
Beyond Taniquetil 5
In Valinor.
Comes never there but one lone star
That fled before the moon;
And there the Two Trees naked are
That bore Night's silver bloom, 10
That bore the globe's fruit of Noon
In Valinor.
There are the shores of Faëry

Readings of the earliest version:

1 Eastâ|..west] Westâ|.. East
7 No stars come there but one alone
8 fled before] hunted with 9 For there the Two Trees naked grow
10 bore] bear 11 bore] bear

With their moonlit pebbled strand
Whose foam is silver musicÂ Â Â Â Â 15
On the opalescent floor
Beyond the great sea-shadows
On the marches of the sand
That stretches on for ever
To the dragonheaded door,Â Â Â Â Â 20
The gateway of the Moon,
Beyond Taniquetil
In Valinor.
West of the Sun, east of the Moon
Lies the haven of the star,Â Â Â Â Â 25
The white town of the Wanderer
And the rocks of Eglamar.
There Wingelot is harboured,
While Eärendel looks afar
Oâer the darkness of the watersÂ Â Â Â Â 30
Between here and Eglamarâ
Out, out, beyond Taniquetil
In Valinor afar.

There are some interesting connections between this poem and the tale of The Coming of the Elves and the Making of Kâ´r. The âlonely hillâ of line 2 is the hill of Kâ´r (cf. the tale, I.122: âat the head of this long creek there stands a lonely hill which gazes at the loftier mountainsâ), while âthe golden feet of Kâ´râ (a line replaced in the later versions of the poem) and very probably âthe sand That stretches on for everâ are explained by the passage that follows in the tale:

Thither [i.e. to Kâ´r] did Aulë« bring all the dust of magic metals that his great works had made and gathered, and he piled it about the foot of that hill, and most of this dust was of gold, and a sand of gold stretched away from the feet of Kâ'ŕ out into the distance where the Two Trees blossomed.

18 marches] margent

20â21 To the dragonheaded door, The gateway of the Moon]

From the golden feet of Kâ'ŕ

24 West of the Sun, east of the Moon] O! West of the Moon, East of the Sun

27 rocks] rock

28 Wingelot] Earliest text Wingelot > Vingelot; second text Vingelot; third text Vingelot > Wingelot; last text Wingelot

30 Oâer the darkness of the waters] On the magic and the wonder

31 Between] âTween

Â

In the latest text Elvenland is lightly written over FaÃ«ry in line 13, and Eldamar against Eglamar in line 27 (only); Eglamar > Eldamar in the second text.

Â

With the âdragonheaded doorâ (line 20) cf. the description of the Door of Night in The Hiding of Valinor (I.215â16):

Its pillars are of the mightiest basalt and its lintel likewise, but great dragons of black stone are carved thereon, and shadowy smoke pours slowly from their jaws.

In that description the Door of Night is not however âthe gateway of the Moonâ, for it is the Sun that passes through it into the outer dark, whereas âthe Moon dares not the utter loneliness of the outer dark by reason of his lesser light and majesty, and he journeys still beneath the world [i.e. through the waters of Vai]â.

IV

The Happy Mariners

I give lastly this poem whose subject is the Tower of Pearl in the Twilit Isles. It was written in July 1915,¹² and there are six texts preceding the version which was published (together with "Why the Man in the Moon came down too soon") at Leeds in 1923* and which is the first of the two given here.

(I)

I know a window in a western tower
That opens on celestial seas,
And wind that has been blowing round the stars
Comes to nestle in its tossing draperies.
It is a white tower builded in the Twilight
Isles, 5
Where Evening sits for ever in the shade;
It glimmers like a spike of lonely pearl
That mirrors beams forlorn and lights that fade;
And sea goes washing round the dark rock where it stands,

And fairy boats go by to gloaming lands 10
All piled and twinkling in the gloom
With hoarded sparks of orient fire

That divers won in waters of the unknown Sun
And, maybe, 'tis a throbbing silver lyre,
Or voices of grey sailors echo up 15
Afloat among the shadows of the world
In oarless shallop and with canvas furled;
For often seems there ring of feet and song
Or twilit twinkle of a trembling gong.

O! happy mariners upon a journey long 20
To those great portals on the Western shores
Where far away constellate fountains leap,
And dashed against Night's dragon-headed doors,
In foam of stars fall sparkling in the deep.
While I alone look out behind the Moon 25
From in my white and windy tower,

Ye bide no moment and await no hour,
 But chanting snatches of a mystic tune
 Go through the shadows and the dangerous seas
 Past sunless lands to fairy leas
 Where stars upon the jacinth wall of space
 Do tangle burst and interlace.
 Ye follow Earendel through the West,
 The shining mariner, to Islands blest;
 While only from beyond that sombre rim
 A wind returns to stir these crystal panes
 And murmur magically of golden rains
 That fall for ever in those spaces dim.

In The Hiding of Valinor (I.215) it is told that when the Sun was first made the Valar purposed to draw it beneath the Earth, but that it was too frail and lissom; and much precious radiance was spilled in their attempts about the deepest waters, and escaped to linger as secret sparks in many an unknown ocean cavern. These have many elfin divers, and divers of the fays, long time sought beyond the outmost East, even as is sung in the song of the Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl.

That "The Happy Mariners" was in fact "the song of the Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl" seems assured by lines 10-13 of the poem.

For "Night's dragon-headed doors" see p. 273. The meaning of jacinth in "the jacinth wall of space" (line 31) is "blue" cf. "the deep-blue walls" in The Hiding of Valinor (1.215).

Â

Many years later my father rewrote the poem, and I give this version here. Still later he turned to it again and made a few further alterations (here recorded in footnotes); at this time he noted that the revised version dated from "1940".

I know a window in a Western tower
that opens on celestial seas, and there from wells of dark behind the stars blows ever cold a keen unearthly breeze.
It is a white tower builded on the Twilit
Isles, 5
and springing from their everlasting shade it glimmers like a house of lonely pearl, where lights forlorn take harbour ere they fade.

Its feet are washed by waves that never rest.
There silent boats go by into the West 10 all piled and twinkling in the dark with orient fire in many a hoarded spark that divers won in waters of the rumoured Sun.
There sometimes throbs below a silver harp, 15
touching the heart with sudden music sharp; or far beneath the mountains high and sheer the voices of grey sailors echo clear, afloat among the shadows of the world in oarless ships and with their canvas furled, 20
chanting a farewell and a solemn song:
for wide the sea is, and the journey long.

O happy mariners upon a journey far, beyond the grey islands and past Gondobar, to those great portals on the final shores 25
where far away constellate fountains leap, and dashed against Nightâs dragon-headed doors
in foam of stars fall sparkling in the deep!
While I, alone, look out behind the moon
from in my white and windy tower, 30
ye bide no moment and await no hour, but go with solemn song and harpersâ tune through the dark shadows and the shadowy seas to the last land of the Two Trees, whose fruit and flower are moon and

sun,Â Â Â Â Â 35
where light of earth is ended and begun.

Last revisions:

3 and there omitted
blows ever cold] there ever blows
17 mountains] mountain
22 the journey] their journey
29 While I look out alone
30 imprisoned in the white and windy tower
31 ye] you
33â6 struck through

Ye follow EÃrendel without rest, the shining mariner, beyond the West, who passed the mouth of night and launched his bark upon the outer seas of everlasting dark.Â Â Â Â Â 40
Here only comes at whiles a wind to blow returning darkly down the way ye go, with perfume laden of unearthly trees.
Here only long afar through window-pane
I glimpse the flicker of the golden rainÂ Â Â Â Â 45 that falls for ever on the outer seas.

I cannot explain the reference (in the revised version only, line 24) to the journey of the mariners âbeyond the grey islands and past Gondobarâ. Gondobar (âCity of Stoneâ) was one of the seven names of Gondolin (p. 158).

NOTES

- 1 Falasquil was the name of Tuorâs dwelling on the coast (p. 152); the Oarni, with the FalmarÃni and the Wingildi, are called âthe spirits of the foam and the surf of oceanâ (I.66).
- 2 IrildÃ: the âElvishâ name corresponding to Gnomish Idril. See the Appendix on Names, entry Idril.
- 3 âElwing of the Gnomes of Artanorâ is perhaps a mere slip.

- 4 For the Swan-wing as the emblem of Tuor see pp. 152, 164, 172, 193.
- 5 The words "Idril has vanished" replace an earlier reading: "Sirion has been sacked and only Littleheart (Ilfrith) remained who tells the tale." Ilfrith is yet another version of Littleheart's Elvish name (see pp. 201â2).
- 6 Struck out here: "The Sleeper is Idril but he does not know."
- 7 Cf. Kortirion among the Trees (I.36, lines 129â30): "I need not know the desert or red palaces Where dwells the sun" lines retained slightly changed in the second (1937) version (I.39).
- 8 This passage, from "rendel distraught", replaced the following: "[illegible name, possibly Orlon] is [?biding] there and tells him of the sack of Sirion and the captivity of Elwing. The faring of the Koreldar and the binding of Melko." Perhaps the words "The faring of the Koreldar" were struck out by mistake (cf. Outline B).
- 9 Earam is emended (at the first occurrence only) from Earam; and following it stood the name Earnhama, but this was struck out. Earnhama is Old English, "Eagle-coat", "Eagle-dress".

37 Ye] You

40 outer omitted

41â3 struck through

46 the] those

Line added at end: beyond the country of the shining Trees.

- 10 The two earliest extant texts date it thus, one of them with the addition "Ex[eter] Coll[ege] Essay Club Dec. 1914", and on a third is written "Gedling, Notts., Sept. 1913 [error for 1914] and later". My father referred to having read "rendel" to the Essay Club in a letter to my mother of 27 November

1914.

11 But rocks in line 27 (26) should read rock.

12 According to one note it was written at âBarnt Green [see Biography p. 36] July 1915 and Bedford and laterâ, and another note dates it âJuly 24 [1915], rewritten Sept. 9â. The original workings are on the back of an unsent letter dated from Moseley (Birmingham) July 11, 1915; my father began military training at Bedford on July 19.

VI

THE HISTORY OF ERIOL OR ÄLFWINE AND THE END OF THE TALES

In this final chapter we come to the most difficult (though not, as I hope to show, altogether insoluble) part of the earliest form of the mythology: its end, with which is intertwined the story of Eriol/Älfwine and with that, the history and original significance of Tol EressÄa. For its elucidation we have some short pieces of connected narrative, but are largely dependent on the same materials as those that constitute Gilfanon's Tale and the story of Eärendel: scribbled plot-outlines, endlessly varying, written on separate slips of paper or in the pages of the little notebook (see p. 254). In this chapter there is much material to consider, and for convenience of reference within the chapter I number the various citations consecutively. But it must be said that no device of presentation can much diminish the inherent complexity and obscurity of the matter.

Ä

The fullest account (bald as it is) of the March of the Elves of KÄr and the events that followed is contained in notebook C, continuing on from the point where I left that outline on p. 255, after the coming of the birds from Gondolin, the counsels of the Gods and uproar of the Elves, and the March of the Inwir and Teleri, with the Solosimpi only agreeing to accompany the expedition on condition that they remain by the sea. The outline continues:

Ä

- (1) Coming of the Eldar. Encampment in the Land of Willows of first host. Overwhelming of Noldorin and ValwÄ. Wanderings of Noldorin with his harp.

Tulkas overthrows Melko in the battle of the Silent Pools. Bound in Lumbi and guarded by Gorgumoth the hound of Mandos.

Release of the Noldoli. War with Men as soon as Tulkas and Noldorin have fared back to Valinor.

Noldoli led to Valinor by Egalthoth and Galdor.

There have been previous references in the Lost Tales to a battle in Tasarinan, the Land of Willows: in the Tale of Turambar (pp. 70, 140), and, most notably, in The Fall of Gondolin (p. 154), where when Tuorâs sojourn in that land is described there is mention of events that would take place there in the future:

Did not even after the days of Tuor Noldorin and his Eldar come there seeking for Dor LÃ³min and the hidden river and the caverns of the Gnomesâ imprisonment; yet thus nigh to their questâs end were like to abandon it? Indeed sleeping and dancing hereâ|they were whelmed by the goblins sped by Melko from the Hills of Iron and Noldorin made bare escape thence.

ValwÃ« has been mentioned once before, by Lindo, on Eriolâs first evening in Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va (I.16): âMy father ValwÃ« who went with Noldorin to find the Gnomes.â Of Noldorin we know also that he was the Vala Salmar, the twin-brother of Ãmar-Amillo; that he entered the world with Ulmo, and that in Valinor he played the harp and lyre and loved the Noldoli (I.66, 75, 93, 126).

An isolated note states:

Â

(2)Â Â Â Â Â Noldorin escapes from the defeat of the Land of Willows and takes his harp and goes seeking in the Iron Mountains for ValwÃ« and the Gnomes until he finds their place of imprisonment. Tulkas follows. Melko comes to meet him.

Â

The only one of the great Valar who is mentioned in these notes as taking part in the expedition to the Great Lands is Tulkas; but whatever story underlay his presence, despite the anger and sorrow of the Valar at the March of the Elves (see p. 257), is quite irrecoverable. (A very faint hint concerning it is found in two isolated notes: âTulkas givesâor the Elves take *limp*Ã« with themâ, and â*Limp*Ã« given by the Gods (OromÃ«? Tulkas?) when Elves left Valinorâ cf. The Flight of the Noldoli (I.166): âno *limp*Ã« had they [the Noldoli] as yet to bring away, for that was not given to the fairies until long after, when the March of Liberation was undertakenâ.) According to (1) above Tulkas fought with and overthrew Melko âin the battle of the Silent Poolsâ and the Silent Pools are the Pools of Twilight, âwhere Tulkas after fought with Melkoâs selfâ (The Fall of Gondolin, p. 195; the original reading here was âNoldorin and Tulkasâ).

The name Lumbi is found elsewhere (in a list of names associated with the tale of The Coming of the Valar, I.93), where it is said to be Melkoâs third dwelling; and a jotting in notebook C, sufficiently mysterious, reads: âLumfad. Melkoâs dwelling after release. Castle of Lumbi.â But this story also is lost.

That the Noldoli were led back to Valinor by Egalmoth and Galdor, as stated in (1), is notable. This is contradicted in detail by a statement in the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin, which says (p. 215) that Egalmoth was slain in the raid on the dwelling at the mouth of Sirion when Elwing was taken; and contradicted in general by the next citation to be given, which denies that the Elves were permitted to dwell in Valinor.

The only other statement concerning these events is found in the first of the four outlines that constitute Gilfanonâs Tale, which I there called âAâ (I.234). This reads:

Â

(3) March of the Elves out into the world.

The capture of Noldorin.

The camp in the Land of Willows.

Army of Tulkas at the Pools of Twilightâ|â|and [?many]

Gnomes, but Men fall on them out of HisilÃ³mÃ«.

Defeat of Melko.

Breaking of Angamandi and release of captives.

Hostility of Men. The Gnomes collect some of the jewels.

Elwing and most of the Elves go back to dwell in Tol EressÃ«a. The Gods will not let them dwell in Valinor.

This seems to differ from (1) in the capture of Noldorin and in the attack of Men from Hisil³m³ before the defeat of Melko; but the most notable statement is that concerning the refusal of the Gods to allow the Elves to dwell in Valinor. There is no reason to think that this ban rested only, or chiefly, on the Noldoli. The text, (3), does not refer specifically to the Gnomes in this connection; and the ban is surely to be related to the sorrow and wrath of the Gods at the time of the March of the Elves (p. 253). Further, it is said in The Cottage of Lost Play (I.16) that Ingil son of Inw³ returned to Tol Eress³a with most of the fairest and the wisest, most of the merriest and the kindest, of all the Eldar, and that the town that he built there was named Koromas or the Resting of the Exiles of K³r. This is quite clearly to be connected with the statement in that Most of the Elves go back to dwell in Tol Eress³a, and with that given on p. 255: The wars with Men and the departure to Tol Eress³a (the Eldar unable to endure the strife of the world). These indications taken together leave no doubt, I think, that my father's original conception was of the Eldar of Valinor undertaking the expedition into the Great Lands against the will of the Valar; together with the rescued Noldoli they returned over the Ocean, but being refused re-entry into Valinor they settled in Tol Eress³a, as the Exiles of K³r. That some did return in the end to Valinor may be concluded from the words of Meril-i-Turinqi (I.129) that Ingil, who built Kortirion, went long ago back to Valinor and is with Manw³. But Tol Eress³a remained the land of the fairies in the early conception, the Exiles of K³r, Eldar and Gnomes, speaking both Eldarissa and Noldorissa.

It seems that there is nothing else to be found or said concerning the original story of the coming of aid out of the West and the renewed assault on Melko.

Â

The conclusion of the whole story as originally envisaged was to be rejected in its entirety. For it we are very largely dependent on the outline in notebook C, continuing on from citation (1) above; this is extremely rough and disjointed, and is given here in a very slightly edited form.

Â

(4) After the departure of Eärendel and the coming of the Elves to Tol Eressëa (and most of this belongs to the history of Men) great ages elapse; Men spread and thrive, and the Elves of the Great Lands fade. As Men's stature grows theirs diminishes. Men and Elves were formerly of a size, though Men always larger.¹

Melko again breaks away, by the aid of Tevildo (who in long ages gnaws his bonds); the Gods are in dissension about Men and Elves, some favouring the one and some the other. Melko goes to Tol Eressëa and tries to stir up dissension among the Elves (between Gnomes and Solosimpi), who are in consternation and send to Valinor. No help comes, but Tulkas sends privily Telimektar (Taimonto) his son.²

Telimektar of the silver sword and Ingil surprise Melko and wound him, and he flees and climbs up the great Pine of Tavrobel. Before the Inwir left Valinor Belaurin (Palärien)³ gave them a seed, and said that it must be guarded, for great tidings would one day come of its growth. But it was forgotten, and cast in the garden of Gilfanon, and a mighty pine arose that reached to Ilwë and the stars.⁴

Telimektar and Ingil pursue him, and they remain now in the sky to ward it, and Melko stalks high above the air seeking ever to do a hurt to the Sun and Moon and stars (eclipses, meteors). He is continually frustrated, but on his first attempt saying that the Gods stole his fire for its making he upset the Sun, so that Urwendi fell into the Sea, and the Ship fell near the ground, scorching regions of the Earth. The clarity of the Sun's radiance has not been so great since, and something of magic has gone from it. Hence it is, and long has been, that the fairies dance and sing more sweetly and can the better be seen by the light of the Moon because of the death of Urwendi.

The Rekindling of the Magic Sun refers in part to the Trees and in part to Urwendi.

Fionwë's rage and grief. In the end he will slay Melko.

Orion is only the image of Telimektar in the sky? [sic] Varda gave him stars, and he bears them aloft that the Gods may know he watches; he has diamonds on his sword-sheath, and this will go red when he draws his sword at the Great End.

But now Telimektar, and Gil⁵ who follows him like a Blue Bee, ward off evil, and Varda immediately replaces any stars that Melko loosens and casts down.

Although grieved at the Godsâ behest, the Pine is cut down; and Melko is thus now out of the worldâbut one day he will find a way back, and the last great uproars will begin before the Great End.

The evils that still happen come about in this wise. The Gods can cause things to enter the hearts of Men, but not of Elves (hence their difficult dealings in the old days of the Exile of the Gnomes)âand though Melko sits without, gnawing his fingers and gazing in anger on the world, he can suggest evil to Men so inclinedâbut the lies he planted of old still grow and spread.

Hence Melko can now work hurt and damage and evil in the world only through Men, and he has more power and subtlety with Men than ManwÃ« or any of the Gods, because of his long sojourn in the world and among Men.

In these early chartings we are in a primitive mythology, with Melko reduced to a grotesque figure chased up a great pine-tree, which is thereupon cut down to keep him out of the world, where he âstalks high above the airâ or âsits without, gnawing his fingersâ, and upsets the Sun-ship so that Urwendi falls into the Seaâand, most strangely, meets her death.

That Ingil (Gil) who with Telimektar pursues Melko is to be identified with Ingil son of InwÃ« who built Kortirion is certain and appears from several notes; see the Appendix on Names to Vol. I, entries Ingil, Telimektar. This is the fullest statement of the Orion-myth, which is referred to in the Tale of the Sun and Moon (see I.182, 200):

of Nielluin [Sirius] too, who is the Bee of Azure, Nielluin whom still may all men see in autumn or winter burning nigh the foot of Telimektar son of Tulkas whose tale is yet to tell.

In the Gnomish dictionary it is said (I.256) that Gil rose into the heavens and âin the likeness of a great bee bearing honey of flameâ followed Telimektar. This presumably represents a distinct conception from that referred to above, where Ingil âwent long ago back to Valinor and is with ManwÃ«â (I. 129).

With the reference to FionwÃ«âs slaying of Melko âin the endâ cf. the end of The Hiding of Valinor (I.219):

FionwÃ« Årion, son of ManwÃ«, of love for Urwendi shall in the end be Melkoâs bane, and shall destroy the world to destroy his foe, and so shall all things then be rolled away.

Cf. also the Tale of Turambar, p. 116, where it is said that Turambar âshall stand beside FionwÃ« in the Great Wrackâ.

For the prophecies and hopes of the Elves concerning the Rekindling of the Magic Sun see pp. 285â6.

The outline in C continues and concludes thus (again with some very slight and insignificant editing):

Â

(5)Â Â Â Â Â Longer ages elapse. Gilfanon is now the oldest and wisest Elf in Tol EressÃ«a, but is not of the Inwirâhence Meril-i-Turingi is Lady of the Isle.

Eriol comes to Tol EressÃ«a. Sojourns at Kortirion. Goes to Tavrobel to see Gilfanon, and sojourns in the house of a hundred chimneysâfor this is the last condition of his drinking limpÃ«. Gilfanon bids him write down all he has heard before he drinks.

Eriol drinks limpÃ«. Gilfanon tells him of things to be; that in his mind (although the fairies hope not) he believes that Tol EressÃ«a will become a dwelling of Men. Gilfanon also prophesies concerning the Great End, and of the Wrack of Things, and of FionwÃ«, Tulkas, and Melko and the last fight on the Plains of Valinor.

Eriol ends his life at Tavrobel but in his last days is consumed with longing for the black cliffs of his shores, even as Meril said.

The book lay untouched in the house of Gilfanon during many ages of Men.

The compiler of the Golden Book takes up the Tale: one of the children of the fathers of the fathers of Men.

[Against this is written:] It may perhaps be much better to let Eriol himself see the last things and finish the book.

Rising of the Lost Elves against the Orcs and Nautar.⁶ The time is not ready for the Faring Forth, but the fairies judge it to be necessary. They obtain through Ulmo the help of Uin,⁷ and Tol Eressëa is uprooted and dragged near to the Great Lands, nigh to the promontory of Rá's. A magic bridge is cast across the intervening sound. Ossë is wroth at the breaking of the roots of the isle he set so long ago—and many of his rare sea-treasures grow about it—that he tries to wrench it back; and the western half breaks off, and is now the Isle of Áverin.

The Battle of Rá's: the Island-elves and the Lost Elves against Nautar, Gongs,⁸ Orcs, and a few evil Men. Defeat of the Elves. The fading Elves retire to Tol Eressëa and hide in the woods.

Men come to Tol Eressëa and also. Orcs, Dwarves, Gongs, Trolls, etc. After the Battle of Rá's the Elves faded with sorrow. They cannot live in air breathed by a number of Men equal to their own or greater; and ever as Men wax more powerful and numerous so the fairies fade and grow small and tenuous, filmy and transparent, but Men larger and more dense and gross. At last Men, or almost all, can no longer see the fairies.

The Gods now dwell in Valinor, and come scarcely ever to the world, being content with the restraining of the elements from utterly destroying Men. They grieve much at what they see; but Ilá vatar is over all.

On the page opposite the passage about the Battle of Rá's is written:

A great battle between Men at the Heath of the Sky-roof (now the Withered Heath), about a league from Tavrobel. The Elves and the Children flee over the Gruir and the Afros.

âEven now do they approach and our great tale comes to its ending.â

The book found in the ruins of the house of a hundred chimneys.

That Gilfanon was the oldest of the Elves of Tol Eressâ«a, though Meril held the title of Lady of the Isle, is said also in the Tale of the Sun and Moon (I.175): but what is most notable is that Gilfanon (not Ailios, teller of the Tale of the Nauglafring, whom Gilfanon replaced, see I.197 note 19 and 229ff.) appears in this outline, which must therefore be late in the period of the composition of the Lost Tales.

Also noteworthy are the references to Eriolâs drinking limpâ« at Gilfanonâs âhouse of a hundred chimneysâ. In The Cottage of Lost Play (I.17) Lindo told Eriol that he could not give him limpâ« to drink:

Turingi only may give it to those not of the Eldar race, and those that drink must dwell always with the Eldar of the Island until such time as they fare forth to find the lost families of the kindred.

Meril-i-Turingi herself, when Eriol besought her for a drink of limpâ«, was severe (I.98):

If you drink this drinkâ|even at the Faring Forth, should Eldar and Men fall into war at the last, still must you stand by us against the children of your kith and kin, but until then never may you fare away home though longings gnaw youâ|

In the text described in I.229ff. Eriol bemoans to Lindo the refusal to grant him his desire, and Lindo, while warning him against âthinking to overpass the bounds that Ilâ°vatar hath setâ, tells him that Meril has not irrevocably refused him. In a note to this text my father wrote: ââ|Eriol fares to Tavrobelâafter Tavrobel he drinks of limpâ«.â

The statement in this passage of outline C that Eriol âin his last days is consumed with longing for the black cliffs of his shores, even as Meril saidâ clearly refers to the passage in The Chaining of Melko from which I have cited above:

On a day of autumn will come the winds and a driven gull, maybe, will wail overhead, and lo! you will be filled with desire, remembering the black coasts of your home. (I.96).

Lindoâs reference, in the passage from The Cottage of Lost Play cited above, to the faring forth of the Eldar of Tol Eressâa âto find the lost families of the kindredâ must likewise relate to the mentions in (5) of the Faring Forth (though the time was not ripe), of the arising of the Lost Elves against the Orcs and Nautarâ, and of âthe Island-elves and the Lost Elvesâ at the Battle of Râ's. Precisely who are to be understood by the âLost Elvesâ is not clear; but in Gilfanonâs Tale (I.231) all Elves of the Great Lands âthat never saw the light at Kâ'râ (Ilkorins), whether or not they left the Waters of Awakening, are called âthe lost fairies of the worldâ, and this seems likely to be the meaning here. It must then be supposed that there dwelt on Tol Eressâa only the Eldar of Kâ'r (the âExilesâ) and the Noldoli released from thralldom under Melko; the Faring Forth was to be the great expedition from Tol Eressâa for the rescue of those who had never departed from the Great Lands.

In (5) we meet the conception of the dragging of Tol Eressâa back eastwards across the Ocean to the geographical position of Englandâit becomes England (see I. 26); that the part which was torn off by Ossâ, the Isle of Äverin, is Ireland is explicitly stated in the Qenya dictionary. The promontory of Râ's is perhaps Brittany.

Here also there is a clear definition of the âfadingâ of the Elves, their physical diminution and increasing tenuity and transparency, so that they become invisible (and finally incredible) to gross Mankind. This is a central concept of the early mythology: the âfairiesâ, as now conceived by Men (in so far as they are rightly conceived), have become so. They were not always so. And perhaps most remarkable in this remarkable passage, there is the final and virtually complete withdrawal of the Gods (to whom the Eldar are âmost like in natureâ, I. 57) from the concerns of âthe worldâ, the Great Lands across the Sea. They watch, it seems, since they grieve, and are therefore not wholly indifferent to what passes in the lands of Men; but they are henceforward utterly remote, hidden in the West.

Other features of (5), the Golden Book of Tavrobel, and the Battle of the Heath of the Sky-roof, will be explained shortly. I give next a separate passage found in the notebook C under the heading "Rekindling of the Magic Sun. Faring Forth."

^

(6) The Elves' prophecy is that one day they will fare forth from Tol Eressëa and on arriving in the world will gather all their fading kindred who still live in the world and march towards Valinor through the southern lands. This they will only do with the help of Men. If Men aid them, the fairies will take Men to Valinor those that wish to go fight a great battle with Melko in Erumäni and open Valinor.⁹ Laurelin and Silpion will be rekindled, and the mountain wall being destroyed then soft radiance will spread over all the world, and the Sun and Moon will be recalled. If Men oppose them and aid Melko the Wrack of the Gods and the ending of the fairies will result and maybe the Great End.

^

On the opposite page is written:

Were the Trees relit all the paths to Valinor would become clear to follow and the Shadowy Seas open clear and free—Men as well as Elves would taste the blessedness of the Gods, and Mandos be emptied.

This prophecy is clearly behind Vairë's words to Eriol (I.19-20): "the Faring Forth, when if all goes well the roads through Arvalin to Valinor shall be thronged with the sons and daughters of Men."

Since the Sun and Moon will be recalled when the Two Trees give light again, it seems that here the Rekindling of the Magic Sun (to which the toast was drunk in Mar Vanwa Tyaliëva, I.17, 65) refers to the relighting of the Trees. But in citation (4) above it is said that the "Rekindling of the Magic Sun" refers in part to the Trees and in part to Urwendiä, while in the Tale of the Sun and Moon (I.179) Yavanna seems to distinguish the two ideas:

"Many things shall be done and come to pass, and the Gods grow old, and the Elves come nigh to fading, ere ye shall see the rekindling of these trees or the Magic Sun relitâ, and the Gods knew not what she meant, speaking of the Magic Sun, nor did for a long while after.

Citation (xix) on p. 264 does not make the reference clear: EÃœrendel âreturns from the firmament ever and anon with VoronwÃ« to KÃ´r to see if the Magic Sun has been lit and the fairies have come backâ but in the following isolated note the Rekindling of the Magic Sun explicitly means the re-arising of Urwendi:

Â

(7)Â Â Â Â Â Urwendi imprisoned by MÃ³ru (upset out of the boat by Melko and only the Moon has been magic since). The Faring Forth and the Battle of ErumÃ¿ni would release her and rekindle the Magic Sun.

Â

This âupsettingâ of the Sun-ship by Melko and the loss of the Sunâs âmagicâ is referred to also in (4), where it is added that Urwendi fell into the sea and met her âdeathâ. In the tale of The Theft of Melko it is said (I.151) that the cavern in which Melko met Ungweliant was the place where the Sun and Moon were imprisoned afterwards, for âthe primeval spirit MÃ³ruâ was indeed Ungweliant (see I.261). The Battle of ErumÃ¿ni is referred to also in (6), and is possibly to be identified with âthe last fight on the plains of Valinorâ prophesied by Gilfanon in (5). But the last part of (5) shows that the Faring Forth came to nothing, and the prophecies were not fulfilled.

Â

There are no other references to the dragging of Tol EressÃ«a across the Ocean by Uin the great whale, to the Isle of Ãverin, or to the Battle of RÃ´s; but a remarkable writing survives concerning the aftermath of the âgreat battle between Men at the Heath of the Sky-roof (now the Withered Heath), about a league from Tavrobelâ (end of citation (5)). This is a very hastily pencilled and exceedingly difficult text titled Epilogue. It begins with a short prefatory note:

Â

(8)Â Â Â Â Â Eriol flees with the fading Elves from the Battle of the High Heath (Ladwen-na-Dhaideloth) and crosses the Gruir and the Afros.

The last words of the book of Tales. Written by Eriol at Tavrobel before he sealed the book.

This represents the development mentioned as desirable in (5), that Eriol should âhimself see the last things and finish the bookâ but an isolated note in C shows my father still uncertain about this even after the Epilogue was in being: âPrologue by the writer of Tavrobel [i.e., such a Prologue is needed] telling how he found Eriolâs writings and put them together. His epilogue after the battle of Ladwen Daideloth is written.â

The rivers Gruir and Afros appear also in the passage about the battle at the end of (5). Since it is said there that the Heath was about a league from Tavrobel, the two rivers are clearly those referred to in the Tale of the Sun and Moon: âthe Tower of Tavrobel beside the riversâ (I. 174, and see I.196 note 2). In scattered notes the battle is also called âthe Battle of the Heaven Roofâ and âthe Battle of Dor-na-Dhaidelothâ.¹⁰

I give now the text of the Epilogue:

And now is the end of the fair times come very nigh, and behold, all the beauty that yet was on earthâfragments of the unimagined loveliness of Valinor whence came the folk of the Elves long long agoânow goeth it all up in smoke. Here be a few tales, memories ill-told, of all that magic and that wonder twixt here and Eldamar of which I have become acquaint more than any mortal man since first my wandering footsteps came to this sad isle.

Of that last battle of the upland heath whose roof is the wide skyânor was there any other place beneath the blue folds of Manwëâs robe so nigh the heavens or so broadly and so well encanopiedâwhat grievous things I saw I have told.

Already fade the Elves in sorrow and the Faring Forth has come to ruin, and Ilâvatar knoweth alone if ever now the Trees shall be relit while the world may last. Behold, I stole by evening from the ruined heath, and my way fled winding down the valley of the Brook of Glass, but the setting of the Sun was blackened with the reek of fires, and the waters of the stream were fouled with the war of men and grime of strife. Then was my heart bitter to see the bones of the good earth laid bare with winds where the destroying hands of men had torn the heather and the fern and burnt them to make sacrifice to Melko and to lust of ruin; and the thronging places of the bees that all day hummed among the whins and whortlebushes long ago bearing rich honey down to Tavrobelâthese were now become fosses and [?mounds] of stark red earth, and nought sang there nor danced but unwholesome airs and flies of pestilence.

Now the Sun died and behold, I came to that most magic wood where once the ageless oaks stood firm amid the later growths of beech and slender trees of birch, but all were fallen beneath the ruthless axes of unthinking men. Ah me, here was the path beaten with spells, trodden with musics and enchantment that wound therethrough, and this way were the Elves wont to ride a-hunting. Many a time there have I seen them and Gilfanon has been there, and they rode like kings unto the chase, and the beauty of their faces in the sun was as the new morning, and the wind in their golden hair like to the glory of bright flowers shaken at dawn, and the strong music of their voices like the sea and like trumpets and like the noise of very many viols and of golden harps unnumbered. And yet again have I seen the people of Tavrobel beneath the Moon, and they would ride or dance across the valley of the two rivers where the grey bridge leaps the joining waters; and they would fare swiftly as clad in dreams, spangled with gems like to the grey dews amid the grass, and their white robes caught the long radiance of the Moonâ|â|â|.and their spears shivered with silver flames.

And now sorrow andâ|..has come upon the Elves, empty is Tavrobel and all are fled, [?fearing] the enemy that sitteth on the ruined heath, who is not a league away; whose hands are red with the blood of Elves and stained with the lives of his own kin, who has made himself an ally to Melko and the Lord of Hate, who has fought for the Orcs and Gongs and the unwholesome monsters of the worldâblind, and a fool, and destruction alone is his knowledge. The paths of the fairies he has made to dusty roads where thirst [?lags wearily] and no man greeteth another in the way, but passes by in sullenness.

So fade the Elves and it shall come to be that because of the encompassing waters of this isle and yet more because of their unquenchable love for it that few shall flee, but as men wax there and grow fat and yet more blind ever shall they fade more and grow less; and those of the after days shall scoff, saying Who are the fairiesâlies told to the children by women or foolish menâwho are these fairies? And some few shall answer: Memories faded dim, a wraith of vanishing loveliness in the trees, a rustle of the grass, a glint of dew, some subtle intonation of the wind; and others yet fewer shall sayââVery small and delicate are the fairies now, yet we have eyes to see and ears to hear, and Tavrobel and Kortirion are filled yet with [?this] sweet folk. Spring knows them and Summer too and in Winter still are they among us, but in Autumn most of all do they come out, for Autumn is their season, fallen as they are upon the Autumn of their days. What shall the dreamers of the earth be like when their winter come.

Hark O my brothers, they shall say, the little trumpets blow; we hear a sound of instruments unimagined small. Like strands of wind, like mystic half-transparencies, Gilfanon Lord of Tavrobel rides out tonight amid his folk, and hunts the elfin deer beneath the paling sky. A music of forgotten feet, a gleam of leaves, a sudden bending of the grass,¹¹ and wistful voices murmuring on the bridge, and they are gone.

But behold, Tavrobel shall not know its name, and all the land be changed, and even these written words of mine belike will all be lost; and so I lay down the pen, and so of the fairies cease to tell.

Another text that bears on these matters is the prose preface to Kortirion among the Trees (1915), which has been given in Part I 25â6, but which I repeat here:

(9)Â Â Â Â Â Now on a time the fairies dwelt in the Lonely Isle after the great wars with Melko and the ruin of Gondolin; and they builded a fair city amidmost of that island, and it was girt with trees. Now this city they called Kortirion, both in memory of their ancient dwelling of KÃ´r in Valinor, and because this city stood also upon a hill and had a great tower tall and grey that Ingil son of InwÃ« their lord let raise.

Very beautiful was Kurtirion and the fairies loved it, and it became rich in song and poesy and the light of laughter; but on a time the great Faring Forth was made, and the fairies had rekindled once more the Magic Sun of Valinor but for the treason and faint hearts of Men. But so it is that the Magic Sun is dead and the Lonely Isle drawn back unto the confines of the Great Lands, and the fairies are scattered through all the wide unfriendly pathways of the world; and now Men dwell even on this faded isle, and care nought or know nought of its ancient days. Yet still there be some of the Eldar and the Noldoli of old who linger in the island, and their songs are heard about the shores of the land that once was the fairest dwelling of the immortal folk.

And it seems to the fairies and it seems to me who know that town and have often trodden its disfigured ways that autumn and the falling of the leaf is the season of the year when maybe here or there a heart among Men may be open, and an eye perceive how is the worldâs estate fallen from the laughter and the loveliness of old. Think on Kortirion and be sadâyet is there not hope?

At this point we may turn to the history of Eriol himself. My fatherâs early conceptions of the mariner who came to Tol EressÃ«a are here again no more than allusive outlines in the pages of the little notebook C, and some of this material cannot be usefully reproduced. Perhaps the earliest is a collection of notes headed âStory of Eriolâs Lifeâ, which I gave in Vol. I.23â4 but with the omission of some features that were not there relevant. I repeat it here, with the addition of the statements previously omitted.

(10) Eriolâs original name was Ottor, but he called himself Wæfre (Old English: ârestless, wanderingâ) and lived a life on the waters. His father was named Eoh (Old English: âhorseâ); and Eoh was slain by his brother Beorn, either âin the siegeâ or âin a great battleâ. Ottor Wæfre settled on the island of Heligoland in the North Sea, and wedded a woman named Cwâcn; they had two sons named Hengest and Horsa âto avenge Eohâ.

Then sea-longing gripped Ottor Wæfre (he was âa son of Eârendelâ, born under his beam), and after the death of Cwâcn he left his young children. Hengest and Horsa avenged Eoh and became great chieftains; but Ottor Wæfre set out to seek, and find, Tol Eressâa (se uncâpaholm, âthe unknown islandâ).

In Tol Eressâa he wedded, being made young by limpâ (here also called by the Old English word lââ¾), Naimi (âadgifu), niece of Vairâ, and they had a son named Heorrenda.

It is then said, somewhat inconsequentially (though the matter is in itself of much interest, and recurs nowhere else), that Eriol told the fairies of Wâ³den, âunor, Tâw, etc. (these being the Old English names of the Germanic gods who in Old Scandinavian form are ââ°inn, ââ³rr, Tâ½r), and they identified them with Manweg, Tulkas, and a third whose name is illegible but is not like that of any of the great Valar.

Eriol adopted the name of Angol.

Thus it is that through Eriol and his sons the Engle (i.e. the English) have the true tradition of the fairies, of whom the Iras and the Wâ©alas (the Irish and Welsh) tell garbled things.

Thus a specifically English fairy-lore is born, and one more true than anything to be found in Celtic lands.

The wedding of Eriol in Tol Eressâa is never referred to elsewhere; but his son Heorrenda is mentioned (though not called Eriolâs son) in the initial link to The Fall of Gondolin (p. 145) as one who âafterwardsâ turned a song of Merilâs maidens into the language of his people. A little more light will be shed on Heorrenda in the course of this chapter.

Associated with these notes is a title-page and a prologue that breaks off after a few lines:

Â

(11)

The Golden Book of Heorrenda being the book of the Tales of Tavrobel

Â

Heorrenda of HÃ|gwudu

This book have I written using those writings that my father Wæfre (whom the Gnomes named after the regions of his home Angol) did make in his sojourn in the holy isle in the days of the Elves; and much else have I added of those things which his eyes saw not afterward; yet are such things not yet to tell. For know

Here then the Golden Book was compiled from Eriolâs writings by his son Heorrendaâin contrast to (5), where it was compiled by someone unnamed, and in contrast also to the Epilogue (8), where Eriol himself concluded and âsealed the bookâ.

As I have said earlier (I.24) Angol refers to the ancient homeland of the âEnglishâ before their migration across the North Sea (for the etymology of Angol/Eriol âironcliffsâ see I.24, 252).

Â

(12)Â Â Â Â Â There is also a genealogical table accompanying the outline (10) and altogether agreeing with it. The table is written out in two forms that are identical save in one point: for Beorn, brother of Eoh, in the one, there stands in the other Hasen of IsenÃ³ra (Old English: âiron shoreâ). But at the end of the table is introduced the cardinal fact of all these earliest materials concerning Eriol and Tol EressÃ«a: Hengest and Horsa, Eriolâs sons by CwÃ«n in Heligoland, and Heorrenda, his son by Naimi in Tol EressÃ«a, are bracketed together, and beneath their names is written:

Â

conquered Æg (âseo unwemmede Ægâ)
now called Engaland and there dwell the Angolcynn or Engle.

Â

Ãæg is Old English, âisleâ seo unwemmede Ãæg âthe unstained isleâ. I have mentioned before (I.25, footnote) a poem of my fatherâs written at Âtaples in June 1916 and called âThe Lonely Isleâ, addressed to England: this poem bears the Old English title seo Unwemmede Ãæg.

Â

(13)Â Â Â Â Â There follow in the notebook C some jottings that make precise identifications of places in Tol EressÂ«a with places in England.

First the name Kortirion is explained. The element KÃ´r is derived from an earlier QorÃ, yet earlier GuorÃ; but from GuorÃ was also derived (i.e. in Gnomish) the form GwÃ´r. (This formulation agrees with that in the Gnomish dictionary, see I.257). Thus KÃ´r = GwÃ´r, and Kortirion = Gwarmindon*, (the asterisk implying a hypothetical, unrecorded form). The name that was actually used in Gnomish had the elements reversed, Mindon-Gwar. (Mindon, like Tirion, meant, and continued always to mean, âtowerâ. The meaning of KÃ´r/GwÃ´r is not given here, but both in the tale of The Coming of the Elves (I.122) and in the Gnomish dictionary (I.257) the name is explained as referring to the roundness of the hill of KÃ´r.)

The note continues (using Old English forms): âIn WÃaelisc CaergwÃ´r, in Englise WarwÃc.â Thus the element War- in Warwick is derived from the same Elvish source as Kor- in Kortirion and Gwar in Mindon-Gwar.¹² Lastly, it is said that âHengestâs capital was *Warwick*â.

Next, Horsa (Hengestâs brother) is associated with Oxenaford (Old English: Oxford), which is given the equivalents Q[enya] Taruktarna and Gnomish Taruithorn* (see the Appendix on Names, p. 347).

The third of Eriolâs sons, Heorrenda, is said to have had his âcapitalâ at Great Haywood (the Staffordshire village where my parents lived in 1916â17, see I.25); and this is given the Qenya equivalents Tavaros(sÂ«) and TaurossÃ«, and the Gnomish Tavrobel and Tavrost; also âEnglise [i.e. Old English *HÃ|gwudu se grÃ©ata, GrÃ©ata HÃ|gwudu*â]¹³

These notes conclude with the statement that âHeorrenda called Kā́r or Gwā́r tā́n. In the context of these conceptions, this is obviously the Old English word tā́n, an enclosed dwelling, from which has developed the modern word town and the place-name ending -ton. Tā́n has appeared several times in the Lost Tales as a later correction, or alternative to Kā́r, changes no doubt dating from or anticipating the later situation where the city was Tā́n and the name Kā́r was restricted to the hill on which it stood. Later still Tā́n became Tiriona, and then when the city of the Elves was named Tirion the hill became Timna, as it is in The Silmarillion; by then it had ceased to have any connotation of 'dwelling-place' and had cut free from all connection with its actual origin, as we see it here, in Old English tā́n, Heorrenda's town.

A

Can all these materials be brought together to form a coherent narrative? I believe that they can (granting that there are certain irreconcilable differences concerning Eriol's life), and would reconstruct it thus:

â The Eldar and the rescued Noldoli departed from the Great Lands and came to Tol Eressëa.

â In Tol Eressëa they built many towns and villages, and in Alalmin³rā, the central region of the island, Ingil son of Inwā built the town of Koromas, 'the Resting of the Exiles of Kā́r' (Exiles, because they could not return to Valinor); and the great tower of Ingil gave the town its name Kortinon. (See I.16.)

â Ottor Wāfre came from Heligoland to Tol Eressëa and dwelt in the Cottage of Lost Play in Kortirion; the Elves named him Eriol or Angol after the 'iron cliffs' of his home.

â After a time, and greatly instructed in the ancient history of Gods, Elves, and Men, Eriol went to visit Gilfanon in the village of Tavrobel, and there he wrote down what he had learnt; there also he at last drank limpā.

â In Tol Eressëa Eriol was wedded and had a son named Heorrenda (Half-elven!). (According to (5)

Eriol died at Tavrobel, consumed with longing for âthe black cliffs of his shoresâ but according to (8), certainly later, he lived to see the Battle of the Heath of the Sky-roof.)

- â The Lost Elves of the Great Lands rose against the dominion of the servants of Melko; and the untimely Faring Forth took place, at which time Tol Eressâ«a was drawn east back across the Ocean and anchored off the coasts of the Great Lands. The western half broke off when Ossâ« tried to drag the island back, and it became the Isle of Âverin (= Ireland).
- â Tol Eressâ«a was now in the geographical position of England.
- â The great battle of RÃ's ended in the defeat of the Elves, who retreated into hiding in Tol Eressâ«a.
- â Evil men entered Tol Eressâ«a, accompanied by Orcs and other hostile beings.
- â The Battle of the Heath of the Sky-roof took place not far from Tavrobel, and (according to (8)) was witnessed by Eriol, who completed the Golden Book.
- â The Elves faded and became invisible to the eyes of almost all Men.
- â The sons of Eriol, Hengest, Horsa, and Heorrenda, conquered the island and it became âEnglandâ.
They were not hostile to the Elves, and from them the English have âthe true tradition of the fairiesâ.
- â Kortirion, ancient dwelling of the fairies, came to be known in the tongue of the English as Warwick; Hengest dwelt there, while Horsa dwelt at Taruithorn (Oxford) and Heorrenda at Tavrobel (Great Haywood). (According to (11) Heorrenda completed the Golden Book.)

This reconstruction may not be âcorrectâ in all its parts:
indeed, it may be that any such attempt is artificial, treating all the notes and jottings as of equal weight and all the ideas as strictly contemporaneous and relatable to each other.
Nonetheless I believe that it shows rightly in essentials how my father was thinking of ordering the narrative in which the Lost

Tales were to be set; and I believe also that this was the conception that still underlay the Tales as they are extant and have been given in these books.

For convenience later I shall refer to this narrative as the Eriol story. Its most remarkable features, in contrast to the later story, are the transformation of Tol Eressëa into England, and the early appearance of the mariner (in relation to the whole history) and his importance.

In fact, my father was exploring (before he decided on a radical transformation of the whole conception) ideas whereby his importance would be greatly increased.

Â

(14)Â Â Â Â Â From very rough jottings it can be made out that Eriol was to be so tormented with home longing that he set sail from Tol Eressëa with his son Heorrenda, against the command of Meril-i-Turinqi (see the passage cited on p. 284 from The Chaining of Melko); but his purpose in doing so was also to hasten the Faring Forth, which he preached in the lands of the East. Tol Eressëa was drawn back to the confines of the Great Lands, but at once hostile peoples named the Guiñolin and the Brithonin (and in one of these notes also the Rãmhoth, Romans) invaded the island. Eriol died, but his sons Hengest and Horsa conquered the Guiñolin. But because of Eriol's disobedience to the command of Meril, in going back before the time for the Faring Forth was ripe, all was cursed and the Elves faded before the noise and evil of war. An isolated sentence refers to a strange prophecy that a man of good will, yet through longing after the things of Men, may bring the Faring Forth to nought.

Thus the part of Eriol was to become cardinal in the history of the Elves; but there is no sign that these ideas ever got beyond this exploratory stage.

Â

I have said that I think that the reconstruction given above (the Eriol story) is in essentials the conception underlying the framework of the Lost Tales. This is both for positive and negative reasons: positive, because he is there still named Eriol (see p. 300), and also because Gilfanon, who enters (replacing Ailios) late in the development of the Tales, appears also in citation (5) above, which is one of the main contributors to this reconstruction; negative, because there is really nothing to contradict what is much the easiest assumption. There is no explicit statement anywhere in the Lost Tales that Eriol came from England. At the beginning (I.13) he is only a traveller from far countries and the fact that the story he told to VÃ«nn of his earlier life (pp. 4â7) agrees well with other accounts where his home is explicitly in England does no more than show that the story remained while the geography alteredâjust as the black coasts of his home survived in later writing to become the western coasts of Britain, whereas the earliest reference to them is the etymology of Angol iron cliffs (his own name, = Eriol, from the land between the seas, Angeln in the Danish peninsula, whence he came: see I.252). There is in fact a very early, rejected, sketch of Eriol's life in which essential features of the same story are outlinedâthe attack on his father's dwelling (in this case the destruction of Eoh's castle by his brother Beorn, see citation (10)), Eriol's captivity and escapeâand in this note it is said that Eriol afterwards wandered over the wilds of the Central Lands to the Inland Sea, Wendels [Old English, the Mediterranean], and hence to the shores of the Western Sea, whence his father had originally come. The mention in the typescript text of the Link to the Tale of TinÃ«iel (p. 6) of wild men out of the Mountains of the East, which the duke could see from his tower, seems likewise to imply that at this time Eriol's original home was placed in some continental region.

The only suggestion, so far as I can see, that this view might not be correct is found in an early poem with a complex history, texts of which I give here.

The earliest rough drafts of this poem are extant; the original title was 'The Wanderer's Allegiance', and it is not clear that it was at first conceived as a poem in three parts. My father subsequently wrote in subtitles on these drafts, dividing the poem into three: Prelude, The Inland City, and The Sorrowful City, with (apparently) an overall title The Sorrowful City; and added a date, March 16â18, 1916. In the only later copy of the whole poem that is extant the overall title is The Town of Dreams and the City of Present Sorrow, with the three parts titled: Prelude (Old English Foresang), The Town of Dreams (Old English pǣt Slāpende Tān), and The city of Present Sorrow (Old English Seo Wācpende Burg). This text gives the dates âMarch 1916, Oxford and Warwick; rewritten Birmingham November 1916â. âThe Town of Dreamsâ is Warwick, on the River Avon, and âThe City of Present Sorrowâ is Oxford, on the Thames, during the First War; there is no evident association of any kind with Eriol or the Lost Tales.

Prelude

In unknown days my fathersâ sires
Came, and from son to son took root
Among the orchards and the river-meads
And the long grasses of the fragrant plain:
Many a summer saw they kindle yellow fires
Of iris in the bowing reeds,
And many a sea of blossom turn to golden fruit
In wallâd gardens of the great champain.

There daffodils among the ordered trees
Did nod in spring, and men laughed deep and long Singing as they laboured happy lays
And lighting even with a drinking-song.
There sleep came easy for the drone of bees
Thronging about cottage gardens heaped with flowers;
In love of sunlit goodness of days
There richly flowed their lives in settled hoursâ
But that was long ago,

And now no more they sing, nor reap, nor sow,
And I perforce in many a town about this isle
Unsettled wanderer have dwelt awhile.

The Town of Dreams

Here many days once gently past me crept
In this dear town of old forgetfulness;
Here all entwined in dreams once long I slept

And heard no echo of the world's distress
Come through the rustle of the elms' rich leaves,
While Avon gurgling over shallows wove Unending melody, and morns and eves
Slipped down her waters till the Autumn came, (Like the gold leaves that drip and flutter then,
Till the dark river gleams with jets of flame
That slowly float far down beyond our ken.)

For here the castle and the mighty tower,
More lofty than the tiered elms,
More grey than long November rain,
Sleep, and nor sunlit moment nor triumphal hour,
Nor passing of the seasons or the Sun
Wakes their old lords too long in slumber lain.

No watchfulness disturbs their splendid dream,
Though laughing radiance dance down the stream;
And be they clad in snow or lashed by windy rains,
Or may March whirl the dust about the winding lanes,
The Elm robe and disrobe her of a million leaves
Like moments clustered in a crowded year,
Still their old heart unmoved nor weeps nor grieves,
Uncomprehending of this evil tide,
Today's great sadness, or Tomorrow's fear:
Faint echoes fade within their drowsy halls
Like ghosts; the daylight creeps across their walls.

The City of Present Sorrow

There is a city that far distant lies
And a vale outcarven in forgotten days
There wider was the grass, and lofty elms more rare;
The river-sense was heavy in the lowland air.
There many willows changed the aspect of the earth and skies
Where feeding brooks wound in by sluggish ways,
And down the margin of the sailing Thames
Around his broad old bosom their old stems

Were bowed, and subtle shades lay on his streams
Where their grey leaves adroop o'er silver pools
Did knit a coverlet like shimmering jewels
Of blue and misty green and filtering gleams.

O aged city of an all too brief sojourn,
I see thy clustered windows each one burn
With lamps and candles of departed men.
The misty stars thy crown, the night thy dress,
Most peerless-magical thou dost possess
My heart, and old days come to life again;
Old mornings dawn, or darkened evenings bring
The same old twilight noises from the town.
Thou hast the very core of longing and delight,
To thee my spirit dances oft in sleep
Along thy great grey streets, or down
A little lamplit alley-way at night
Thinking no more of other cities it has known,
Forgetting for a while the tree-girt keep,
And town of dreams, where men no longer sing.
For thy heart knows, and thou shedst many tears
For all the sorrow of these evil years.
Thy thousand pinnacles and fretted spires
Are lit with echoes and the lambent fires
Of many companies of bells that ring
Rousing pale visions of majestic days
The windy years have strewn down distant ways;
And in thy halls still doth thy spirit sing
Songs of old memory amid thy present tears,
Or hope of days to come half-sad with many fears.
Lo! though along thy paths no laughter runs
While war untimely takes thy many sons,
No tide of evil can thy glory drown
Robed in sad majesty, the stars thy crown.

In addition, there are two texts in which a part of The City of Present Sorrow is treated as a separate entity. This begins with "O aged city of an all too brief sojourn", and is briefer: after the line "Thinking no more of other cities it has known" it ends:

Forgetting for a while that all men weep
It strays there happy and to thee it sings âNo tide of evil can thy glory drown,
Robed in sad majesty, the stars thy crown!â

This was first called The Sorrowful City, but the title was then changed to WÃnsele wÃ©ste, windge reste rÃ©te berofene (Beowulf lines 2456â7, very slightly adapted: âthe hall of feasting empty, the resting places swept by the wind, robbed of laughterâ).

There are also two manuscripts in which The Town of Dreams is treated as a separate poem, with a subtitle An old town revisited; in one of these the primary title was later changed to The Town of Dead Days.

Lastly, there is a poem in two parts called The Song of Eriol. This is found in three manuscripts, the later ones incorporating minor changes made to the predecessor (but the third has only the second part of the poem).

The Song of Eriol

Eriol made a song in the Room of the Tale-fire telling how his feet were set to wandering, so that in the end he found the Lonely Isle and that fairest town Kortirion.

I

In unknown days my fathersâ sires
Came, and from son to son took root
Among the orchards and the river-meads
And the long grasses of the fragrant plain:

Many a summer saw they kindle yellow fires
Of flaglilies among the bowing reeds,
And many a sea of blossom turn to golden fruit
In wallÃ©d gardens of the great champain.

There daffodils among the ordered trees
Did nod in spring, and men laughed deep and long Singing as they laboured happy lays
And lighting even with a drinking-song.

There sleep came easy for the drone of bees
Thronging about cottage gardens heaped with flowers;
In love of sunlit goodliness of days
There richly flowed their lives in settled hoursâ
 But that was long ago,
 And now no more they sing, nor reap, nor sow;
 And I perforce in many a town about this isle
 Unsettled wanderer have dwelt awhile.

2

Wars of great kings and clash of armouries,
Whose swords no man could tell, whose spears
Were numerous as a wheatfieldâs ears,
Rolled over all the Great Lands; and the Seas

Were loud with navies; their devouring fires
Behind the armies burned both fields and towns;
And sacked and crumbled or to flaming pyres
Were cities made, where treasures and crowns,

Kings and their folk, their wives and tender maids
Were all consumed. Now silent are those courts, Ruined the towers, whose old shape slowly fades,
And no feet pass beneath their broken ports.

There fell my father on a field of blood,
And in a hungry siege my mother died,
And I, a captive, heard the great seasâ flood Calling and calling, that my spirit cried

For the dark western shores whence long ago had come Sires of my mother, and I broke my bonds,
Faring oâer wasted valleys and dead lands
Until my feet were moistened by the western sea,
Until my ears were deafened by the hum,
The splash, and roaring of the western seaâ

 But that was long ago
 And now the dark bays and unknown waves I know,

The twilight capes, the misty archipelago,
And all the perilous sounds and salt wastes âtween this isle
Of magic and the coasts I knew awhile.

Â

One of the manuscripts of âThe Song of Eriolâ bears a later note: âEasington 1917â18â (Easington on the estuary of the Humber, see Humphrey Carpenter, Biography, p. 97;). It may be that the second part of The Song of Eriol was written at Easington and added to the first part (formerly the Prelude) already in existence.

Little can be derived from this poem of a strictly narrative nature, save the lineaments of the same tale: Eriolâs father fell âon a field of bloodâ, when âwars of great kingsâ rolled over all the Great Landsâ, and his mother died âin a hungry siegeâ (the same phrase is used in the Link to the Tale of TinÃviel, pp. 5â6); he himself was made a captive, but escaped, and came at last to the shores of the Western Sea (whence his motherâs people had come).

The fact that the first part of The Song of Eriol is also found as the Prelude to a poem of which the subjects are Warwick and Oxford might make one suspect that the castle with a great tower overhanging a river in the story told by Eriol to VÃ«annÃ« was once again Warwick. But I do not think that this is so. There remains in any case the objection that it would be difficult to accommodate the attack on it by men out of the Mountains of the East which the duke could see from his tower; but also I think it is plain that the original tripartite poem had been dissevered, and the Prelude given a new bearing: my fatherâs âfathersâ siresâ became Eriolâs âfathersâ siresâ. At the same time, certain powerful images were at once dominant and fluid, and the great tower of Eriolâs home was indeed to become the tower of Kortirion or Warwick, when (as will be seen shortly) the structure of the story of the mariner was radically changed. And nothing could show more clearly than does the evolution of this poem the complex root from which the story rose.

Â

Humphrey Carpenter, writing in his Biography of my father's life after he returned to Oxford in 1925, says (p. 169):

He made numerous revisions and recastings of the principal stories in the cycle, deciding to abandon the original sea-voyager âEriolâ to whom the stories were told, and instead renaming him âÃlfwineâ or âelf-friendâ.

That Eriol was (for a time) displaced by Ãlfwine is certain. But while it may well be that at the time of the texts now to be considered the name Eriol had actually been rejected, in the first version of âThe Silmarillionâ proper, written in 1926, Eriol reappears, while in the earliest Annals of Valinor, written in the 1930s, it is said that they were translated in Tol EressÃ«a âby Eriol of Leithien, that is Ãlfwine of the Angelcynnâ. On the other hand, at this earlier period it seems entirely justifiable on the evidence to treat the two names as indicative of different narrative projectionsââthe Eriol storyâ and âthe Ãlfwine storyâ.

âÃlfwineâ, then, is associated with a new conception, subsequent to the writing of the Lost Tales. The mariner is Ãlfwine, not Eriol, in the second âSchemeâ for the Tales, which I have called âan unrealised project for the revision of the whole workâ (see I.234). The essential difference may be made clear now, before citing the difficult evidence: Tol EressÃ«a is now in no way identified with England, and the story of the drawing back of the Lonely Island across the sea has been abandoned. England is indeed still at the heart of this later conception, and is named Luthany.¹⁴ The mariner, Ãlfwine, is an Englishman sailing westward from the coast of Britain; and his role is diminished. For whereas in the writings studied thus far he comes to Tol EressÃ«a before the dÃ©nouement and disaster of the Faring Forth, and either he himself or his descendants witness the devastation of Tol EressÃ«a by the invasion of Men and their evil allies (in one line of development he was even to be responsible for it, p. 294), in the later narrative outlines he does not arrive until all the grievous history is done. His part is only to learn and to record.¹⁵

Â

I turn now to a number of short and very oblique passages, written on separate slips, but found together and clearly dating from much the same time.

Â

- (15) Ælfwine of England dwelt in the South-west; he was of the kin of Ing, King of Luthany. His mother and father were slain by the sea-pirates and he was made captive.

He had always loved the fairies: his father had told him many things (of the tradition of Ing). He escapes. He beats about the northern and western waters. He meets the Ancient Marinerâand seeks for Tol Eressâ«a (seo unwemmede Æeg), whither most of the unfaded Elves have retired from the noise, war, and clamour of Men.

The Elves greet him, and the more so when they learn of him who he is. They call him LÃºthien the man of Luthany. He finds his own tongue, the ancient English tongue, is spoken in the isle.

The âAncient Marinerâ has appeared in the story that Eriol told to VÃ«annÃ« (pp. 5, 7), and much more will be told of him subsequently.

Â

- (16) Ælfwine of Engaland, [added later: driven by the Normans,] arrives in Tol Eressâ«a, whither most of the fading Elves have withdrawn from the world, and there fade now no more.

Description of the harbour of the southern shore. The fairies greet him well hearing he is from Engaland. He is surprised to hear them speak the speech of Ælfred of Wessex, though to one another they spoke a sweet and unknown tongue.

The Elves name him LÃºthien for he is come from Luthany, as they call it (âfriendâ and âfriendshipâ). Eldaros or ÆlfhÃ«m. He is sped to RÃº's their capital. There he finds the Cottage of Lost Play, and Lindo and VairÃ«.

He tells who he is and whence, and why he has long sought for the isle (by reason of traditions in the kin of Ing), and he begs the Elves to come back to Engaland.

Here begins (as an explanation of why they cannot) the series of stories called the Book of Lost Tales.

In this passage (16) Alfwine becomes more firmly rooted in English history: he is apparently a man of eleventh-century Wessexâbut as in (15) he is of âthe kin of Ingâ. The capital of the Elves of Tol Eressâa is not Kortirion but Râ's, a name now used in a quite different application from that in citation (5), where it was a promontory of the Great Lands.

I have been unable to find any trace of the process whereby the name Lâ^othien came to be so differently applied afterwards (Lâ^othien Tinâ^oviel). Another note of this period explains the name quite otherwise: âLâ^othien or Lâ^osion was son of Telumaith (Telumektar). Alfwine loved the sign of Orion, and made the sign, hence the fairies called him Lâ^othien (Wanderer).â There is no other mention of *Alfwine*âs peculiar association with Orion nor of this interpretation of the name Lâ^othien; and this seems to be a development that my father did not pursue.

Â

It is convenient to give here the opening passage from the second Scheme for the Lost Tales, referred to above; this plainly belongs to the same time as the rest of these â*Alfwine*â notes, when the Tales had been written so far as they ever went within their first framework.

Â

(17) Alfwine awakens upon a sandy beach. He listens to the sea, which is far out. The tide is low and has left him.

Alfwine meets the Elves of Râ's; finds they speak the speech of the English, beside their own sweet tongue. Why they do soâthe dwelling of Elves in Luthany and their faring thence and back. They clothe him and feed him, and he sets forth to walk along the islandâs flowery ways.

The scheme goes on to say that on a summer evening Alfwine came to Kortirion, and thus differs from (16), where he goes to âRâ's their capitalâ, in which he finds the Cottage of Lost Play. The name Râ's seems to be used here in yet another senseâpossibly a name for Tol Eressâa.

Â

(18) He is sped to Ælfhǣm (Elfhame) Eldos where Lindo and Vairǣ tell him many things: of the making and ancient fashion of the world: of the Gods: of the Elves of Valinor: of Lost Elves and Men: of the Travail of the Gnomes: of Eāwrendel: of the Faring Forth and the Loss of Valinor: of the disaster of the Faring Forth and the war with evil Men. The retreat to Luthany where Ingwǣ was king. Of the home-thirst of the Elves and how the greater number sought back to Valinor. The loss of Elwing. How a new home was made by the Solosimpi and others in Tol Eressǣa. How the Elves continually sadly leave the world and fare thither.

Â

For the interpretation of this passage it is essential to realise (the key indeed to the understanding of this projected history) that the Faring Forth does not here refer to the Faring Forth in the sense in which it has been used hitherto—that from Tol Eressǣa for the Rekindling of the Magic Sun, which ended in ruin, but to the March of the Elves of Kôr and the Loss of Valinor—that the March incurred (see pp. 253, 257, 280). It is not indeed clear why it is here called a disaster: but this is evidently to be associated with the war with evil Men, and war between Elves and Men at the time of the March from Kôr is referred to in citations (1) and (3).

In the Eriol story it is explicit that after the March from Kôr the Elves departed from the Great Lands to Tol Eressǣa; here on the other hand the war with evil Men is followed by the retreat to Luthany where Ingwǣ was king. The (partial) departure to Tol Eressǣa is from Luthany; the loss of Elwing seems to take place on one of these voyages. As will be seen, the Faring Forth of the Eriol story has disappeared as an event of Elvish history, and is only mentioned as a prophecy and a hope.

Schematically the essential divergence of the two narrative structures can be shown thus:

Â

(~~Ælfhǣm~~ story)

Â

March of the Elves of Kôr to the Great Lands (called the Faring Forth)

War with Men in the Great Lands

Retreat of the Elves to Tol Eressëa (England) by Ingwë

Departure of many Elves to Tol Eressëa (loss of Elwing)

Elfwine sails from the English (North Sea region) to Tol Eressëa

The Faring Forth, drawing of Tol Eressëa to the Great Lands; ultimately Tol Eressëa > England

Â

This is of course by no means a full statement of the Âlfwine story, and is merely set out to indicate the radical difference of structure. Lacking from it is the history of Luthany, which emerges from the passages that now follow.

Â

(19) Luthany means âfriendshipâ, LÂ°thien âfriendâ. Luthany the only land where Men and Elves once dwelt an age in peace and love.

How for a while after the coming of the sons of Ing the Elves thrived again and ceased to fare away to Tol Eressëa.

How Old English became the sole mortal language which an Elf will speak to a mortal that knows no Elfin.

(20) Âlfwine of England (whose father and mother were slain by the fierce Men of the Sea who knew not the Elves) was a great lover of the Elves, especially of the shoreland Elves that lingered in the land. He seeks for Tol Eressëa whither the fairies are said to have retired.

He reaches it. The fairies call him LÂ°thien. He learns of the making of the world, â|â|. of Gods and Elves, of Elves and Men, down to the departure to Tol Eressëa.

How the Faring Forth came to nought, and the fairies took refuge in Albion or Luthany (the Isle of Friendship).

Seven invasions.

Of the coming of Men to Luthany, how each race quarrelled, and the fairies faded, until [?the most] set sail, after the coming of the RÂ°mhoth, for the West. Why the Men of the seventh invasion, the Ingwaiwar, are more friendly.

Ingwā and Eärendel who dwelt in Luthany before it was an isle and was [sic] driven east by Ossë to found the Ingwaiwar.

- (21) All the descendants of Ing were well disposed to Elves; hence the remaining Elves of Luthany spoke to [?them] in the ancient tongue of the English, and since some have faredâ|..to Tol Eressâ that tongue is there understood, and all who wish to speak to the Elves, if they know not and have no means of learning Elfin speeches, must converse in the ancient tongue of the English.

Â

In (20) the term âFaring Forthâ must again be used as it is in (18), of the March from Kôr. There it was called a âdisasterâ (see p. 303), and here it is said that it âcame to noughtâ: it must be admitted that it is hard to see how that can be said, if it led to the binding of Melko and the release of the enslaved Noldoli (see (1) and (3)).

Also in (20) is the first appearance of the idea of the Seven Invasions of Luthany. One of these was that of the Râmhoth (mentioned also in (14)) or Romans; and the seventh was that of the Ingwaiwar, who were not hostile to the Elves.

Here something must be said of the name Ing (Ingwā, Ingwaiar) in these passages. As with the introduction of Hengest and Horsa, the association of the mythology with ancient English legend is manifest. But it would serve no purpose, I believe, to enter here into the obscure and speculative scholarship of English and Scandinavian origins: the Roman writersâ term Inguaeones for the Baltic maritime peoples from whom the English came; the name Ingwine (interpretable either as Ing-wine âthe friends of Ingâ or as containing the same Ingw- seen in Inguaeones); or the mysterious personage Ing who appears in the Old English Runic Poem:

Ing wā|s ā|restÂ Â Â mid East-Denum gesewen secgumÂ Â Â oā¾ he siā¾an east ofer wā|g gewat;Â Â Â wā|n ā|fter ran âwhich may be translated: âIng was first seen by men among the East Danes, until he departed eastwards over the waves; his car sped after him. It would serve no purpose, because although the connection of my father's Ing, Ingwā with the shadowy Ing (Ingw-) of northern historical legend is certain and indeed obvious he seems to have been intending no more than an association of his mythology with known traditions (though the words of the Runic Poem were clearly influential). The matter is made particularly obscure by the fact that in these notes the names Ing and Ingwā intertwine with each other, but are never expressly differentiated or identified.

Thus Álfwine was of the kin of Ing, King of Luthany (15, 16), but the Elves retreated to Luthany where Ingwā was king (18). The Elves of Luthany thrived again after the coming of the sons of Ing (19), and the Ingwaiwar, seventh of the invaders of Luthany, were more friendly to the Elves (20), while Ingwā founded the Ingwaiwar (20). This name is certainly to be equated with Inguaeones (see above), and the invasion of the Ingwaiwar (or Sons of Ing) equally certainly represents the Anglo-Saxon invasion of Britain. Can Ing, Ingwā be equated? So far as this present material is concerned, I hardly see how they can not be. Whether this ancestor-founder is to be equated with Inwā (whose son was Ingil) of the Lost Tales is another question. It is hard to believe that there is no connection (especially since Inwā in The Cottage of Lost Play is emended from Ing, I.22), yet it is equally difficult to see what that connection could be, since Inwā of the Lost Tales is an Elda of Kā'r (Ingwā Lord of the Vanyar in The Silmarillion) while Ing(wā) of the Álfwine story is a Man, the King of Luthany and Álfwine's ancestor. (In outlines for Gilfanon's Tale it is said that Ing King of Luthany was descended from Ermon, or from Ermon and Elmir (the first Men, I. 236-7).)

The following outlines tell some more concerning Ing(wā) and the Ingwaiwar:

Á

- (22) How Ing sailed away at eld [i.e. in old age] into the twilight, and Men say he came to the Gods, but he dwells on Tol Eressā, and will guide the fairies one day back to Luthany when the Faring Forth takes place.*

How he prophesied that his kin should fare back again and possess Luthany until the days of the coming of the Elves.

How the land of Luthany was seven times invaded by Men, until at the seventh the children of the children of Ing came back to their own.

How at each new war and invasion the Elves faded, and each loved the Elves less, until the RÃºmhoth cameâand they did not even believe they existed, and the Elves all fled, so that save for a few the isle was empty of the Elves for three hundred years.

(23) How IngwÃ« drank limpÃ« at the hands of the Elves and reigned ages in Luthany.

How EÃ«rendel came to Luthany to find the Elves gone.

How IngwÃ« aided him, but was not suffered to go with him. EÃ«rendel blessed all his progeny as the mightiest sea-rovers of the world.¹⁶

How OssÃ« made war upon IngwÃ« because of EÃ«rendel, and Ing longing for the Elves set sail, and all were wrecked after being driven far east.

How Ing the immortal came among the Dani OroDÃ«jni Urdainoth East Danes.

How he became the half-divine king of the Ingwaiwar, and taught them many things of Elves and Gods, so that some true knowledge of the Gods and Elves lingered in that folk alone.

Part of another outline that does not belong with the foregoing passages but covers the same part of the narrative as (23) may be given here:

Â

(24) EÃ«rendel takes refuge with [IngwÃ«] from the wrath of OssÃ«, and gives him a draught of limpÃ« (enough to assure immortality). He gives him news of the Elves and the dwelling on Tol EressÃ«a.

IngwÃ« and a host of his folk set sail to find Tol EressÃ«a, but OssÃ« blows them back east. They are utterly wrecked. Only IngwÃ« rescued on a raft. He becomes king of the Angali, Euti, Saksani, and Firisandi,* who adopt the title of Ingwaiwar. He teaches them much magic and first sets menâs hearts to seafaring westwardâ|â|

After a great [?age of rule] IngwÃ« sets sail in a little boat and is heard of no more.

It is clear that the intrusion of Luthany, and Ing(wÃ«), into the conception has caused a movement in the story of EÃ«rendel: whereas in the older version he went to Tol EressÃ«a after the departure of the Eldar and Noldoli from the Great Lands (pp. 253, 255), now he goes to Luthany; and the idea of OssÃ«âs enmity towards EÃ«rendel (pp. 254, 263) is retained but brought into association with the origin of the Ingwaiwar.

It is clear that the narrative structure is:

â Ing(wÃ«) King of Luthany.

â EÃ«rendel seeks refuge with him (after [many of] the Elves have departed to Tol EressÃ«a).

â Ing(wÃ«) seeks Tol EressÃ«a but is driven into the East.

â Seven invasions of Luthany.

â The people of Ing(wÃ«) are the Ingwaiwar, and they âcome back to their ownâ when they invade Luthany from across the North Sea.

(25) Luthany was where the tribes first embarked in the Lonely Isle for Valinor, and whence they landed for the Faring Forth,* whence [also] many sailed with Elwing to find Tol EressÃ«a.

Â

That Luthany was where the Elves, at the end of the great journey from Palisor, embarked on the Lonely Isle for the Ferrying to Valinor, is probably to be connected with the statement in (20) that âIngwÃ« and EÃ«rendel dwelt in Luthany before it was an isleâ.

Â

(26) There are other references to the channel separating Luthany from the Great Lands: in rough jottings in notebook C there is mention of an isthmus being cut by the Elves, âfearing Men now that IngwÃ« has goneâ, and âto the white cliffs where the silver spades of the Teleri workedâ also in the next citation.

Â

(27) The Elves tell Ãlfwine of the ancient manner of Luthany, of Kortirion or Gwarthyryn (Caer GwÃ«r),¹⁷ of Tavrobel.

How the fairies dwelt there a hundred ages before Men had the skill to build boats to cross the channelâso that magic lingers yet mightily in its woods and hills.

How they renamed many a place in Tol EressÃ«a after their home in Luthany. Of the Second Faring Forth and the fairiesâ hope to reign in Luthany and replant there the magic treesâand it depends most on the temper of the Men of Luthany (since they first must come there) whether all goes well.

Notable here is the reference to âthe Second Faring Forthâ, which strongly supports my interpretation of the expression âFaring Forthâ in (18), (20), and (25); but the prophecy or hope of the Elves concerning the Faring Forth has been greatly changed from its nature in citation (6): here, the Trees are to be replanted in Luthany.

Â

(28) How Ãlfwine lands in Tol EressÃ«a and it seems to him like his own land madeâ|â|.clad in the beauty of a happy dream. How the folk comprehended [his speech] and learn whence he is come by the favour of Ulmo. How he is sped to Kortirion.

Â

With these two passages it is interesting to compare (9), the prose preface to Kortirion among the Trees, according to which Kortirion was a city built by the Elves in Tol EressÃ«a; and when Tol EressÃ«a was brought across the sea, becoming England, Kortirion was renamed in the tongue of the English Warwick (13). In the new story, Kortirion is likewise an ancient dwelling of the Elves, but with the change in the fundamental conception it is in Luthany; and the Kortirion to which Ãlfwine comes in Tol EressÃ«a is the second of the name (being called âafter their home in Luthanyâ). There has thus been a very curious transference, which may be rendered schematically thus:

(I) Kortirion, Elvish dwelling in Tol Eressâ«a.

Tol Eressâ«a England.

Kortirion = Warwick.

(II) Kortirion, Elvish dwelling in Luthany (> England).

Elves Tol Eressâ«a.

Kortirion (2) in Tol Eressâ«a named after Kortirion (1) in Luthany.

On the basis of the foregoing passages, (15) to (28), we may attempt to construct a narrative taking account of all the essential features:

â March of the Elves of KÃ´r (called âthe Faring Forthâ, or (by implication in 27) âthe First Faring Forthâ) into the Great Lands, landing in Luthany (25), and the Loss of Valinor (18).

â War with evil Men in the Great Lands (18).

â The Elves retreated to Luthany (not yet an island) where Ing(wÃ«) was king (18, 20).

â Many [but by no means all] of the Elves of Luthany sought back west over the sea and settled in Tol Eressâ«a; but Elwing was lost (18, 25).

â Places in Tol Eressâ«a were named after places in Luthany (27).

â EÃ«rendel came to Luthany, taking refuge with Ing(wÃ«) from the hostility of OssÃ« (20, 23, 24).

â EÃ«rendel gave Ing(wÃ«) limpÃ« to drink (24), or Ing(wÃ«) received limpÃ« from the Elves before EÃ«rendel came (23).

â EÃ«rendel blessed the progeny of Ing(wÃ«) before his departure (23).

â OssÃ«âs hostility to EÃ«rendel pursued Ing(wÃ«) also (23, 24).

â Ing(wÃ«) set sail (with many of his people, 24) to find Tol Eressâ«a (23, 24).

- â Ing(wÃ«)âs voyage, through the enmity of OssÃ«, ended in shipwreck, but Ing(wÃ«) survived, and far to the East [i.e. after being driven across the North Sea] he became King of the Ingwaiwar the ancestors of the Anglo-Saxon invaders of Britain (23, 24).
- â Ing(wÃ«) instructed the Ingwaiwar in true knowledge of the Gods and Elves (23) and turned their hearts to seafaring westwards (24). He prophesied that his kin should one day return again to Luthany (22).
- â Ing(wÃ«) at length departed in a boat (22, 24), and was heard of no more (24), or came to Tol EressÃ«a (22).
- â After Ing(wÃ«)âs departure from Luthany a channel was made so that Luthany became an isle (26); but Men crossed the channel in boats (27).
- â Seven successive invasions took place, including that of the RÃºmhoth or Romans, and at each new war more of the remaining Elves of Luthany fled over the sea (20, 22).
- â The seventh invasion, that of the Ingwaiwar, was however not hostile to the Elves (20, 21); and these invaders were âcoming back to their ownâ (22), since they were the people of Ing(wÃ«).
- â The Elves of Luthany (now England) thrive again and ceased to leave Luthany for Tol EressÃ«a (19), and they spoke to the Ingwaiwar in their own language, Old English (21).
- â Ãlfwine was an Englishman of the Anglo-Saxon period, a descendant of Ing(wÃ«), who had derived a knowledge of and love of the Elves from the tradition of his family (15, 16).
- â Ãlfwine came to Tol EressÃ«a, found that Old English was spoken there, and was called by the Elves LÃºthien âfriendâ, the Man of Luthany (the Isle of Friendship) (15, 16, 19).

I claim no more for this than that it seems to me to be the only way in which these dissecta membra can be set together into a comprehensive narrative scheme. It must be admitted even so that it requires some forcing of the evidence to secure apparent agreement. For example, there seem to be different views of the relation of the Ingwaiwar to Ing(w): they are 'the sons of Ing' (19), 'his kin' (22), 'the children of the children of Ing' (22), yet he seems to have become the king and teacher of North Sea peoples who had no connection with Luthany or the Elves (23, 24). (Over whom did he rule when the Elves first retreated to Luthany (18, 23)?) Again, it is very difficult to fit the 'hundred ages' during which the Elves dwelt in Luthany before the invasions of Men began (27) to the rest of the scheme. Doubtless in these jottings my father was thinking with his pen, exploring independent narrative paths; one gets the impression of a ferment of ideas and possibilities rapidly displacing one another, from which no one stable narrative core can be extracted. A complete 'solution' is therefore in all probability an unreal aim, and this reconstruction no doubt as artificial as that attempted earlier for 'the Eriol story' (see p. 293). But here as there I believe that this outline shows as well as can be the direction of my father's thought at that time.

^

There is very little to indicate the further course of 'the Alfwine story' after his sojourn in Tol Eress: (as I have remarked, p. 301, the part of the mariner is only to learn and record tales out of the past); and virtually all that can be learned from these notes is found on a slip that reads:

^

(29) How Alfwine drank of limp but thirsted for his home, and went back to Luthany; and thirsted then unquenchably for the Elves, and went back to Tavrobel the Old and dwelt in the House of the Hundred Chimneys (where grows still the child of the child of the Pine of Belawryn) and wrote the Golden Book.

^

Associated with this is a title-page:

^

(30)

The Book of Lost Tales and the History of the Elves of Luthany

[?being]

The Golden Book of Tavrobél

the same that Ælfwine wrote and laid in the House of a Hundred Chimneys at Tavrobél, where it lieth still to read for such as may.

Â

These are very curious. Tavrobél the Old must be the original Tavrobél in Luthany (after which Tavrobél in Tol Eressëa was named, just as Kortirion in Tol Eressëa was named after Kortirion = Warwick in Luthany); and the House of the Hundred Chimneys (as also the Pine of Belawryn, on which see p. 281 and note 4) was to be displaced from Tol Eressëa to Luthany. Presumably my father intended to rewrite those passages in the âframeworkâ of the Lost Tales where the House of a Hundred Chimneys in Tavrobél is referred to; unless there was to be another House of a Hundred Chimneys in Tavrobél the New in Tol Eressëa.

Lastly, an interesting entry in the Qenya dictionary may be mentioned here: Parma Kuluinen âthe Golden Bookâthe collected book of legends, especially of Ing and Eärendelâ.

Â

In the event, of all these projections my father only developed the story of Ælfwineâs youth and his voyage to Tol Eressëa to a full and polished form, and to this work I now turn; but first it is convenient to collect the passages previously considered that bear on it.

In the opening Link to the Tale of Tinâvie Eriol said that âmany years agoâ, when he was a child, his home was âin an old town of Men girt with a wall now crumbled and broken, and a river ran thereby over which a castle with a great tower hungâ.

My father came of a coastward folk, and the love of the sea that I had never seen was in my bones, and my father whetted my desire, for he told me tales that his father had told him before. Now my mother died in a cruel and hungry siege of that old town, and my father was slain in bitter fight about the walls, and in the end I Eriol escaped to the shoreland of the Western Sea.

Eriol told then of his wanderings about the western havens,â|of how he was wrecked upon far western islands until at last upon one lonely one he came upon an ancient sailor who gave him shelter, and over a fire within his lonely cabin told him strange tales of things beyond the Western Seas, of the Magic Isles and that most lonely one that lay beyondâ|.

âEver after,â said Eriol, âdid I sail more curiously about the western isles seeking more stories of the kind, and thus it is indeed that after many great voyages I came myself by the blessing of the Gods to Tol Eressâ«a in the endâ|â

In the typescript version of this Link it is further told that in the town where Eriolâs parents lived and died there dwelt a mighty duke, and did he gaze from the topmost battlements never might he see the bounds of his wide domain, save where far to east the blue shapes of the great mountains layâyet was that tower held the most lofty that stood in the lands of Men.

The siege and sack of the town were the work of âthe wild men from the Mountains of the Eastâ.

At the end of the typescript version the boy Ausir assured Eriol that âthat ancient mariner beside the lonely sea was none other than Ulmoâs self, who appeareth not seldom thus to those voyagers whom he lovesâ but Eriol did not believe him.

I have given above (pp. 294â5) reasons for thinking that in âthe Eriol storyâ this tale of his youth was not set in England.

Turning to the passages concerned with the later, Âlfwine story, we learn from (15) that Âlfwine dwelt in the South-west of England and that his mother and father were slain by âthe sea-piratesâ, and from (20) that they were slain by âthe fierce Men of the Seaâ from (16) that he was âdriven by the Normansâ. In (15) there is a mention of his meeting with âthe Ancient Marinerâ during his voyages. In (16) he comes to âthe harbour of the southern shoreâ of Tol Eressâ«a; and in (17) he âawakens upon a sandy beachâ at low tide.

Â

I come now to the narrative that finally emerged. It will be observed, perhaps with relief, that Ing, Ingwā, and the Ingwaiwar have totally disappeared.

ÁLFWINE OF ENGLAND

There are three versions of this short work. One is a plot-outline of less than 500 words, which for convenience of reference I shall call. Álfwine A; but the second is a much more substantial narrative bearing the title Álfwine of England. This was written in 1920 or later: demonstrably not earlier, for my father used for it scraps of paper pinned together, and some of these are letters to him, all dated in February 1920.¹⁸ The third text no doubt began as a fair copy in ink of the second, to which it is indeed very close at first, but became as it proceeded a complete rewriting at several points, with the introduction of much new matter, and it was further emended after it had been completed. It bears no title in the manuscript, but must obviously be called Álfwine of England likewise.

For convenience I shall refer to the first fully-written version as Álfwine I and to its rewriting as Álfwine II. The relation of Álfwine A to these is hard to determine, since it agrees in some respects with the one and in some with the other. It is obvious that my father had Álfwine I in front of him when he wrote Álfwine II, but it seems likely that he drew on Álfwine A at the same time.

I give here the full text of Álfwine II in its final form, with all noteworthy emendations and all important differences from the other texts in the notes (differences in names, and changes to names, are listed separately).

There was a land called England, and it was an island of the West, and before it was broken in the warfare of the Gods it was westernmost of all the Northern lands, and looked upon the Great Sea that Men of old called Garsecg;¹⁹ but that part that was broken was called Ireland and many names besides, and its dwellers come not into these tales.

All that land the Elves named *Lāthien*²⁰ and do so yet. In Lāthien alone dwelt still the most part of the Fading Companies, the Holy Fairies that have not yet sailed away from the world, beyond the horizon of Men's knowledge, to the Lonely Island, or even to the Hill of TÃ»n²¹ upon the Bay of FaÃ»ry that washes the western shores of the kingdom of the Gods. Therefore is LÃ»thien even yet a holy land, and a magic that is not otherwise lingers still in many places of that isle.

Now amidmost of that island is there still a town that is aged among Men, but its age among the Elves is greater far; and, for this is a book of the Lost Tales of Elfinesse, it shall be named in their tongue Kortirion, which the Gnomes call Mindon Gwar.²² Upon the hill of Gwar dwelt in the days of the English a man and his name was DÃ»or, and he came thither from afar, from the south of the island and from the forests and from the enchanted West, where albeit he was of the English folk he had long time wandered. Now the Prince of Gwar was in those days a lover of songs and no enemy of the Elves, and they lingered yet most of all the isle in those regions about Kortirion (which places they called AlalminÃ»rÃ», the Land of Elms), and thither came DÃ»or the singer to seek the Prince of Gwar and to seek the companies of the Fading Elves, for he was an Elf-friend. Though DÃ»or was of English blood, it is told that he wedded to wife a maiden from the West, from Lionesse as some have named it since, or Evadrien âCoast of Ironâ as the Elves still say. DÃ»or found her in the lost land beyond Belerion whence the Elves at times set sail.

Mirth had DÃ»or long time in Mindon Gwar, but the Men of the North, whom the fairies of the island called Forodwaith, but whom Men called other names, came against Gwar in those days when they ravaged wellnigh all the land of LÃ»thien. Its walls availed not and its towers might not withstand them for ever, though the siege was long and bitter.

There Ã»adgifu (for so did DÃ»or name the maiden of the West, though it was not her name aforetime)²³ died in those evil hungry days; but DÃ»or fell before the walls even as he sang a song of ancient valour for the raising of menâs hearts. That was a desperate sally, and the son of DÃ»or was Ã»lfwine, and he was then but a boy left fatherless. The sack of that town thereafter was very cruel, and whispers of its ancient days alone remained, and the Elves that had grown to love the English of the isle fled or hid themselves for a long time, and none of Elves or Men were left in his old halls to lament the fall of Æswine Prince of Gwar.

Then Ælfwine, even he whom the unfaded Elves beyond the waters of Garsecg did after name Eldairon of LÃ©thien (which is Ælfwine of England), was made a thrall to the fierce lords of the Forodwaith, and his boyhood knew evil days. But behold a wonder, for Ælfwine knew not and had never seen the sea, yet he heard its great voice speaking deeply in his heart, and its murmurous choirs sang ever in his secret ear between wake and sleep, that he was filled with longing. This was of the magic of Æadgifu, maiden of the West, his mother, and this longing unquenchable had been hers all the days that she dwelt in the quiet inland places among the elms of Mindon Gwarâand amidmost of her longing was Ælfwine her child born, and the Foamriders, the Elves of the Sea-marge, whom she had known of old in Lionesse, sent messengers to his birth. But now Æadgifu was gone beyond the Rim of Earth, and her fair form lay unhonoured in Mindon Gwar, and DÃ©orÃ©s harp was silent, but Ælfwine laboured in thralldom until the threshold of manhood, dreaming dreams and filled with longing, and at rare times holding converse with the hidden Elves.

At last his longing for the sea bit him so sorely that he contrived to break his bonds, and daring great perils and suffering many grievous toils he escaped to lands where the Lords of the Forodwaith had not come, far from the places of DÃ©orÃ©s abiding in Mindon Gwar. Ever he wandered southward and to the west, for that way his feet unbidden led him. Now Ælfwine had in a certain measure the gift of elfin-sight (which was not given to all Men in those days of the fading of the Elves and still less is it granted now), and the folk of LÃ©thien were less faded too in those days, so that many a host of their fair companies he saw upon his wandering road. Some there were dwelt yet and danced yet about that land as of old, but many more there were that wandered slowly and sadly westward; for behind them all the land was full of burnings and of war, and its dwellings ran with tears and with blood for the little love of Men for Men. nor was that the last of the takings of Lâthien by Men from Men, which have been seven, and others mayhap still shall be. Men of the East and of the West and of the South and of the North have coveted that land and dispossessed those who held it before them, because of its beauty and goodness and of the glamour of the fading ages of the Elves that lingered still among its trees beyond its high white shores.²⁴

Yet at each taking of that isle have many more of the most ancient of all dwellers therein, the folk of Lâthien, turned westward; and they have got them in ships at Belerion in the West and sailed thence away for ever over the horizon of Men's knowledge, leaving the island the poorer for their going and its leaves less green; yet still it abides the richest among Men in the presence of the Elves. And it is said that, save only when the fierce fathers of Men, foes of the Elves, being new come under the yoke of Evil,²⁵ entered first that land, never else did so great a concourse of elfin ships and white-winged galleons sail to the setting sun as in those days when the ancient Men of the South set first their mighty feet upon the soil of Lâthien. The Men whose lords sat in the city of power that Elves and Men have called Râm (but the Elves alone do know as Magbar).²⁶

Now is it the dull hearts of later days rather than the red deeds of cruel hands that set the minds of the little folk to fare away; and ever and anon a little ship²⁷ weighs anchor from Belerion at eve and its sweet sad song is lost for ever on the waves. Yet even in the days of Ælfwine there was many a laden ship under elfin sails that left those shores for ever, and many a comrade he had, seen or half-unseen, upon his westward road. And so he came at last to Belerion, and there he laved his weary feet in the grey waters of the Western Sea, whose great roaring drowned his ears. There the dim shapes of Elvish²⁸ boats sailed by him in the gloaming, and many aboard called to him farewell. But he might not embark on those frail craft, and they refused his prayerâfor they were not willing that even one beloved among Men should pass with them beyond the edge of the West, or learn what lies far out on Garsecg the great and measureless sea. Now the men who dwelt thinly about those places nigh Belerion were fishermen, and Ælfwine abode long time amongst them, and being of nature shaped inly thereto he learned all that a man may of the craft of ships and of the sea. He recked little of his life, and he set his ocean-paths wider than most of those men, good mariners though they were; and there were few in the end who dared to go with him, save Ælfheah the fatherless who was with him in all ventures until his last voyage.²⁹

Now on a time journeying far out into the open sea, being first becalmed in a thick mist, and after driven helpless by a mighty wind from the East, he espied some islands lying in the dawn, but he won not ever thereto for the winds changing swept him again far away, and only his strong fate saved him to see the black coasts of his abiding once again. Little content was he with his good fortune, and purposed in his heart to sail some time again yet further into the West, thinking unwitting it was the Magic Isles of the songs of Men that he had seen from afar. Few companions could he get for this adventure. Not all men love to sail a quest for the red sun or to tempt the dangerous seas in thirst for undiscovered things. Seven such found he in the end, the greatest mariners that were then in England, and Ulmo Lord of the Sea afterward took them to himself and their names are now forgotten, save Ælfheah only.³⁰ A great storm fell upon their ship even as they had sighted the isles of Ælfwineâs desire, and a great sea swept over her; but Ælfwine was lost in the waves, and coming to himself saw no sign of ship or comrades, and he lay upon a bed of sand in a deep-walled cove. Dark and very empty was the isle, and he knew then that these were not those Magic Isles of which he had heard often tell.³¹

There wandering long, âtis said, he came upon many hulls of wrecks rotting on the long gloomy beaches, and some were wrecks of many mighty ships of old, and some were treasure-laden. A lonely cabin looking westward he found at last upon the further shore, and it was made of the upturned hull of a small ship. An ancient man dwelt there, and Ælfwine feared him, for the eyes of the man were as deep as the unfathomable sea, and his long beard was blue and grey; great was his stature, and his shoes were of stone,³² but he was all clad in tangled rags, sitting beside a small fire of drifted wood.

In that strange hut beside an empty sea did Ælfwine long abide for lack of other shelter or of other counsel, thinking his ship lost and his comrades drowned. But the ancient man grew kindly toward him, and questioned Ælfwine concerning his coming and his goings and whither he had desired to sail before the storm took him. And many things before unheard did Ælfwine hear tell of him beside that smoky fire at eve, and strange tales of wind-harried ships and harbourless tempests in the forbidden waters. Thus heard Ælfwine how the Magic Isles were yet a great voyage before him keeping a dark and secret ward upon the edge of Earth, beyond whom the waters of Garsecg grow less troublous and there lies the twilight of the latter days of Fairyland. Beyond and on the confines of the Shadows lies the Lonely Island looking East to the Magic Archipelago and to the lands of Men beyond it, and West into the Shadows beyond which afar off is glimpsed the Outer Land, the kingdom of the Godsâeven the aged Bay of FaÃkry whose glory has grown dim. Thence slopes the world steeply beyond the Rim of Things to Valinor, that is God-home, and to the Wall and to the edge of Nothingness whereon are sown the stars. But the Lonely Isle is neither of the Great Lands or of the Outer Land, and no isle lies near it.

In his tales that aged man named himself the Man of the Sea, and he spoke of his last voyage ere he was cast in wreck upon this outer isle, telling how ere the West wind took him he had glimpsed afar off bosomed in the deep the twinkling lanterns of the Lonely Isle. Then did Ælfwineâs heart leap within him, but he said to that aged one that he might not hope to get him a brave ship or comrades more. But that Man of the Sea said: âLo, this is one of the ring of Harbourless Isles that draw all ships towards their hidden rocks and quaking sands, lest Men fare over far upon Garsecg and see things that are not for them to see. And these isles were set here at the Hiding of Valinor, and little wood for ship or raft does there grow on them, as may be thought;³³ but I may aid thee yet in thy desire to depart from these greedy shores.â

Thereafter on a day Ælfwine fared along the eastward strands gazing at the many unhappy wrecks there lying. He sought, as often he had done before, if he might see perchance any sign or relic of his good ship from Belerion. There had been that night a storm of great violence and dread, and lo! the number of wrecks was increased by one, and Ælfwine saw it had been a large and well-built ship of cunning lines such as the Forodwaith then loved. Cast far up on the treacherous sands it stood, and its great beak carved as a dragon's head still glared unbroken at the land. Then went the Man of the Sea out when the tide began to creep in slow and shallow over the long flats. He bore as a staff a timber great as a young tree, and he fared as if he had no need to fear tide or quicksand until he came far out where his shoulders were scarce above the yellow waters of the incoming flood to that carved prow, that now alone was seen above the water. Then Ælfwine marvelled watching from afar, to see him heave by his single strength the whole great ship up from the clutches of the sucking sand that gripped its sunken stern; and when it floated he thrust it before him, swimming now with mighty strokes in the deepening water. At that sight Ælfwine's fear of the aged one was renewed, and he wondered what manner of being he might be; but now the ship was thrust far up on the firmer sands, and the swimmer strode ashore, and his mighty beard was full of strands of sea-weed, and sea-weed was in his hair.

When that tide again forsook the Hungry Sands the Man of the Sea bade Ælfwine go look at that new-come wreck, and going he saw it was not hurt; but there were within nine dead men who had not long ago been yet alive. They lay abottom gazing at the sky, and behold, one whose garb and mien still proclaimed a chieftain of Men lay there, but though his locks were white with age and his face was pale in death, still a proud man and a fierce he looked. "Men of the North, Forodwaith, are they," said the Man of the Sea, "but hunger and thirst was their death, and their ship was flung by last night's storm where she stuck in the Hungry Sands, slowly to be engulfed, had not fate thought otherwise."

"Truly do you say of them, O Man of the Sea; and him I know well with those white locks, for he slew my father; and long was I his thrall, and Orm men called him, and little did I love him."

"And his ship shall it be that bears you from this Harbourless Isle," said he; "and a gallant ship it was of a brave man, for few folk have now so great a heart for the adventures of the sea as have these Forodwaith, who press ever into the mists of the West, though few live to take back tale of all they see."

Thus it was that Álfwine escaped beyond hope from that island, but the Man of the Sea was his pilot and steersman, and so they came after few days to a land but little known.³⁴ And the folk that dwell there are a strange folk, and none know how they came thither in the West, yet are they accounted among the kindreds of Men, albeit their land is on the outer borders of the regions of Mankind, lying yet further toward the Setting Sun beyond the Harbourless Isles and further to the North than is that isle whereon Álfwine was cast away. Marvellously skilled are these people in the building of ships and boats of every kind and in the sailing of them; yet do they fare seldom or never to the lands of other folk, and little do they busy themselves with commerce or with war. Their ships they build for love of that labour and for the joy they have only to ride the waves in them. And a great part of that people are ever aboard their ships, and all the water about the island of their home is ever white with their sails in calm or storm. Their delight is to vie in rivalry with one another with their boats of surpassing swiftness, driven by the winds or by the ranks of their long-shafted oars. Other rivalries have they with ships of great seaworthiness, for with these will they contest who will weather the fiercest storms (and these are fierce indeed about that isle, and it is iron-coasted save for one cool harbour in the North). Thereby is the craft of their shipwrights proven; and these people are called by Men the Ythlings,³⁵ the Children of the Waves, but the Elves call the island Eneadur, and its folk the Shipmen of the West.³⁶

Well did these receive Ālfwine and his pilot at the thronging quays of their harbour in the North, and it seemed to Ālfwine that the Man of the Sea was not unknown to them, and that they held him in the greatest awe and reverence, hearkening to his requests as though they were a king's commands. Yet greater was his amazement when he met amid the throngs of that place two of his comrades that he had thought lost in the sea; and learnt that those seven mariners of England were alive in that land, but the ship had been broken utterly on the black shores to the south, not long after the night when the great sea had taken Ālfwine overboard.

Now at the bidding of the Man of the Sea do those islanders with great speed fashion a new ship for Ālfwine and his fellows, since he would fare no further in Orm's ship; and its timbers were cut, as the ancient sailor had asked, from a grove of magic oaks far inland that grew about a high place of the Gods, sacred to Ulmo Lord of the Sea, and seldom were any of them felled. "A ship that is wrought of this wood," said the Man of the Sea, "may be lost, but those that sail in it shall not in that voyage lose their lives; yet may they perhaps be cast where they little think to come."

But when that ship was made ready that ancient sailor bid them climb aboard, and this they did, but with them went also Bior of the Ythlings, a man of mighty sea-craft for their aid, and one who above any of that strange folk was minded to sail at times far from the land of Eneadur to West or North or South. There stood many men of the Ythlings upon the shore beside that vessel; for they had builded her in a cove of the steep shore that looked to the West, and a bar of rock with but a narrow opening made here a sheltered pool and mooring place, and few like it were to be found in that island of sheer cliffs. Then the ancient one laid his hand upon her prow and spoke words of magic, giving her power to cleave uncloven waters and enter unentered harbours, and ride untrodden beaches. Twin rudder-paddles, one on either side, had she after the fashion of the Ythlings, and each of these he blessed, giving them skill to steer when the hands that held them failed, and to find lost courses, and to follow stars that were hid. Then he strode away, and the press of men parted before him, until climbing he came to a high pinnacle of the cliffs. Then leapt he far out and down and vanished with a mighty flurry of foam where the great breakers gathered to assault the towering shores.

Álfwine saw him no more, and he said in grief and amaze: "Why was he thus weary of life? My heart grieves that he is dead," but the Ythlings smiled, so that he questioned some that stood nigh, saying: "Who was that mighty man, for meseems ye know him well," and they answered him nothing. Then thrust they forth that vessel valiant-timbered³⁷ out into the sea, for no longer would Álfwine abide, though the sun was sinking to the Mountains of Valinor beyond the Western Walls. Soon was her white sail seen far away filled with a wind from off the land, and red-stained in the light of the half-sunken sun; and those aboard her sang old songs of the English folk that faded on the sailless waves of the Western Seas, and now no longer came any sound of them to the watchers on the shore. Then night shut down and none on Eñeadur saw that strong ship ever more.³⁸

So began those mariners that long and strange and perilous voyage whose full tale has never yet been told. Nought of their adventures in the archipelagoes of the West, and the wonders and the dangers that they found in the Magic Isles and in seas and sound unknown, are here to tell, but of the ending of their voyage, how after a time of years sea-weary and sick of heart they found a grey and cheerless day. Little wind was there, and the clouds hung low overhead; while a grey rain fell, and nought could any of them descry before their vessel's beak that moved now slow and uncertain over the long dead waves. That day had they trysted to be the last ere they turned their vessel homeward (if they might), save only if some wonder should betide or any sign of hope. For their heart was gone. Behind them lay the Magic Isles where three of their number slept upon dim strands in deadly sleep, and their heads were pillowed on white sand and they were clad in foam, wrapped about in the agelong spells of Eglavain. Fruitless had been all their journeys since, for ever the winds had cast them back without sight of the shores of the Island of the Elves.³⁹ Then said Álfheah⁴⁰ who held the helm: "Now, O Álfwine, is the trysted time! Let us do as the Gods and their winds have long desired—cease from our heart-weary quest for nothingness, a fable in the void, and get us back if the Gods will it seeking the hearths of our home." And Álfwine yielded. Then fell the wind and no breath came from East or West, and night came slowly over the sea.

Behold, at length a gentle breeze sprang up, and it came softly from the West; and even as they would fill their sails therewith for home, one of those shipmen on a sudden said: "Nay, but this is a strange air, and full of scented memories," and standing still they all breathed deep. The mists gave before that gentle wind, and a thin moon they might see riding in its tattered shreds, until behind it soon a thousand cool stars peered forth in the dark. "The night-flowers are opening in Faëry," said Álfwine; "and behold," said Bior,⁴¹ "the Elves are kindling candles in their silver dusk," and all looked whither his long hand pointed over their dark stern. Then none spoke for wonder and amaze, seeing deep in the gloaming of the West a blue shadow, and in the blue shadow many glittering lights, and ever more and more of them came twinkling out, until ten thousand points of flickering radiance were splintered far away as if a dust of the jewels self-luminous that Fānor made were scattered on the lap of the Ocean.

"Then is that the Harbour of the Lights of Many Hues," said Álfheah, "that many a little-headed tale has told of in our homes." Then saying no more they shot out their oars and swung about their ship in haste, and pulled towards the never-dying shore. Near had they come to abandoning it when hardly won. Little did they make of that long pull, as they thrust the water strongly by them, and the long night of Faërie held on, and the horned moon of Elfinesse rode over them.

Then came there music very gently over the waters and it was laden with unimagined longing, that Ælfwine and his comrades leant upon their oars and wept softly each for his heart's half-remembered hurts, and memory of fair things long lost, and each for the thirst that is in every child of Men for the flawless loveliness they seek and do not find. And one said: "It is the harps that are thrumming, and the songs they are singing of fair things; and the windows that look upon the sea are full of light." And another said: "Their stringed violins complain the ancient woes of the immortal folk of Earth, but there is a joy therein." "Ah me," said Ælfwine, "I hear the horns of the Fairies shimmering in magic woods—such music as I once dimly guessed long years ago beneath the elms of Mindon Gwar."

And lo! as they spoke thus musing the moon hid himself, and the stars were clouded, and the mists of time veiled the shore, and nothing could they see and nought more hear, save the sound of the surf of the seas in the far-off pebbles of the Lonely Isle; and soon the wind blew even that faint rustle far away. But Ælfwine stood forward with wide-open eyes unspeaking, and suddenly with a great cry he sprang forward into the dark sea, and the waters that filled him were warm, and a kindly death it seemed enveloped him. Then it seemed to the others that they awakened at his voice as from a dream; but the wind now suddenly grown fierce filled all their sails, and they saw him never again, but were driven back with hearts all broken with regret and longing. Pale elfin boats awhile they would see beating home, maybe, to the Haven of Many Hues, and they hailed them; but only faint echoes afar off were borne to their ears, and none led them ever to the land of their desire; who after a great time wound back all the mazy clue of their long tangled ways, until they cast anchor at last in the haven of Belerion, aged and wayworn men. And the things they had seen and heard seemed after to them a mirage, and a phantasy, born of hunger and sea-spells, save only to Bior of Eneadur of the Ship-folk of the West.

Yet among the seed of these men has there been many a restless and wistful spirit thereafter, since they were dead and passed beyond the Rim of Earth without need of boat or sail. But never while life lasted did they leave their sea-faring, and their bodies are all covered by the sea.⁴²

The narrative ends here. There is no trace of any further continuation, though it seems likely that Álfrwine of England was to be the beginning of a complete rewriting of the Lost Tales. It would be interesting to know for certain when Álfrwine II was written. The handwriting of the manuscript is certainly changed from that of the rest of the Lost Tales; yet I am inclined to think that it followed Álfrwine I at no great interval, and the first version is unlikely to be much later than 1920 (see p. 312).

At the end of Álfrwine II my father jotted down two suggestions: (1) that Álfrwine should be made an early pagan Englishman who fled to the West and (2) that the Isle of the Old Man should be cut out and all should be shipwrecked on Eneadur, the Isle of the Ythlings. The latter would (astonishingly) have entailed the abandonment of the foundered ship, with the Man of the Sea thrusting it to shore on the incoming tide, and the dead Vikings lying abottom gazing at the sky.

In this narrative in which the magic of the early Elves is most intensely conveyed, in the seamen's vision of the Lonely Isle beneath the horned moon of Elfinesse Álfrwine is still placed in the context of the figures of ancient English legend: his father is Dācor the Minstrel. In the great Anglo-Saxon manuscript known as the Exeter Book there is a little poem of 42 lines to which the title of Dācor is now given. It is an utterance of the minstrel Dācor, who, as he tells, has lost his place and been supplanted in his lord's favour by another bard, named Heorrenda; in the body of the poem Dācor draws examples from among the great misfortunes recounted in the heroic legends, and is comforted by them, concluding each allusion with the fixed refrain pā's ofereode; ƿissas swa mālg, which has been variously translated; my father held that it meant 'Time has passed since then, this too can pass'.⁴³

From this poem came both Dæor and Heorrenda. In the Eriol story Heorrenda was Eriol's son born in Tol Eressëa of his wife Naimi (p. 290), and was associated with Hengest and Horsa in the conquest of the Lonely Isle (p. 291); his dwelling in England was at Tavrobel (p. 292). I do not think that my father or Dæor the Minstrel of Kortirion and Heorrenda of Tavrobel can be linked more closely to the Anglo-Saxon poem than in the names alone—though he did not take the names at random. He was moved by the glimpsed tale (even if, in the words of one of the poem's editors, 'the autobiographical element is purely fictitious, serving only as a pretext for the enumeration of the heroic stories'); and when lecturing on Beowulf at Oxford he sometimes gave the unknown poet a name, calling him Heorrenda.

Nor, as I believe, can any more be made of the other Old English names in the narrative: 'swine prince of Gwar, 'Adgifu, 'Alfheah (though the names are doubtless in themselves 'significant': thus 'swine contains 's's 'god' and 'wine 'friend', and 'Adgifu 'ad 'blessedness' and 'gifu 'gift'). The Forodwaith are of course Viking invaders from Norway or Denmark; the name Orm of the dead ship's captain is well-known in Norse. But all this is a mise-en-scène that is historical only in its bearings, not in its structure.

The idea of the seven invasions of Lóthien (Luthany) remained (p. 314), and that of the fading and westward flight of the Elves (which indeed was never finally lost),⁴⁴ but whereas in the outlines the invasion of the Ingwaiwar (i.e. the Anglo-Saxons) was the seventh (see citations (20) and (22)), here the Viking invasions are portrayed as coming upon the English—nor was that the last of the takings of Lóthien by Men from Men (p. 314), obviously a reference to the Normans.

Â

There is much of interest in the 'geographical' references in the story. At the very beginning there is a curious statement about the breaking off of Ireland 'in the warfare of the Gods'. Seeing that the Álfwine story does not include the idea of the drawing back of Tol Eressëa eastwards across the sea, this must refer to something quite other than the story in (5), p. 283, where the Isle of Æverin was broken off when Ossë tried to wrench back Tol Eressëa. What this was I do not know; but it seems conceivable that this is the first trace or hint of the great cataclysm at the end of the Elder Days, when Beleriand was drowned. (I have found no trace of any connection between the harbour of Belерion and the region of Beleriand.)

Kortirion (Mindon Gwar) is in this tale of course âKortirion the Oldâ, the original Elvish dwelling in L thien, after which Kortirion in Tol Eress a was named (see pp. 308, 310); in the same way we must suppose that the name Alalmin r  (p. 313) for the region about it ( Warwickshire ) was given anew to the midmost region of Tol Eress a.

Turning to the question of the islands and archipelagoes in the Great Sea, what is said in  lfwine of England may first be compared with the passages of geographical description in The Coming of the Valar (1.68) and The Coming of the Elves (I.125), which are closely similar the one to the other. From these passages we learn that there are many lands and islands in the Great Sea before the Magic Isles are reached; beyond the Magic Isles is Tol Eress a; and beyond Tol Eress a are the Shadowy Seas,  whereon there float the Twilit Isles , the first of the Outer Lands. Tol Eress a itself  is held neither of the Outer Lands or of the Great Lands  (I.125); it is far out in mid-ocean, and  no land may be seen for many leagues  sail from its cliffs  (I.121). With this account  lfwine of England agrees closely; but to it is added now the archipelago of the Harbourless Isles.

As I have noted before (I.137), this progression from East to West of Harbourless Isles, Magic Isles, the Lonely Isle, and then the Shadowy Seas in which were the Twilit Isles, was afterwards changed, and it is said in The Silmarillion (p. 102) that at the time of the Hiding of Valinor the Enchanted Isles were set, and all the seas about them were filled with shadows and bewilderment. And these isles were strung as a net in the Shadowy Seas from the north to the south, before Tol Eress a, the Lonely Isle, is reached by one sailing west. Hardly might any vessel pass between them, for in the dangerous sounds the waves sighed for ever upon dark rocks shrouded in mist. And in the twilight a great weariness came upon mariners and a loathing of the sea; but all that ever set foot upon the islands were there entrapped, and slept until the Change of the World.

As a conception, the Enchanted Isles are derived primarily from the old Magic Isles, set at the time of the Hiding of Valinor and described in that Tale (I.211): "Ossë set them in a great ring about the western limits of the mighty sea, so that they guarded the Bay of Faëry, and all such as stepped thereon came never thence again, but being woven in the nets of Oinen's hair the Lady of the Sea, and whelmed in a long slumber that L'rien set there, lay upon the margin of the waves, as those do who being drowned are cast up once more by the movements of the sea; yet rather did these hapless ones sleep unfathomably and the dark waters laved their limbs!

Here three of Ælfwine's companions slept upon dim strands in deadly sleep, and their heads were pillowed on white sand and they were clad in foam, wrapped about in the a-long spells of Eglavain (p. 320).

(I do not know the meaning of the name Eglavain, but since it clearly contains Egla (Gnomish, = Elda, see I.251) it perhaps meant "Elfiness.") But the Enchanted Isles derive also perhaps from the Twilit Isles, since the Enchanted Isles were likewise in twilight and were set in the Shadowy Seas (cf. I.224); and from the Harbourless Isles as well, which, as Ælfwine was told by the Man of the Sea (p. 317), were set at the time of the Hiding of Valinor and indeed served the same purpose as did the Magic Isles, though lying far further to the East.

Eneadur, the isle of the Ythlings (Old English $\tilde{A}^{1/2}\tilde{A}^{\circ}$ "wave"), whose life is so fully described in Ælfwine of England, seems never to have been mentioned again. Is there in Eneadur and the Shipmen of the West perhaps some faint foreshadowing of the early N°men³reans in their cliff-girt isle?

The following passage (pp. 316-17) is not easy to interpret:

Thence [i.e. from the Bay of Faëry] slopes the world

steeply beyond the Rim of Things to Valinor, that is God-home, and to the Wall and to the edge of Nothingness whereon are sown the stars.

In the Ambarkanta or 'Shape of the World' of the 1930s a map of the world shows the surface of the Outer Land sloping steeply westwards from the Mountains of Valinor. Conceivably it is to this slope that my father was referring here, and the Rim of Things is the great mountainwall; but this seems very improbable. There are also references in Álfwine of England to 'the Rim of Earth', beyond which the dead pass (pp. 314, 322); and in an outline for the Tale of Eärendel (p. 260) Tuor's boat dips over the world's rim. More likely, I think, the expression refers to the rim of the horizon ('the horizon of Men's knowledge', p. 313).

The expression 'the sun was sinking to the Mountains of Valinor beyond the Western Walls' (p. 320) I am at a loss to explain according to what has been told in the Lost Tales. A possible, though scarcely convincing, interpretation is that the sun was sinking towards Valinor, whence it would pass 'beyond the Western Walls' (i.e. through the Door of Night, see I.215-16).

Â

Lastly, the suggestion (p. 313) is notable that the Elves sailing west from Lûthien might go beyond the Lonely Isle and reach even back to Valinor; on this matter see p. 280.

Â

Before ending, there remains to discuss briefly a matter of a general nature that has many times been mentioned in the texts, and especially in these last chapters: that of the 'diminutiveness' of the Elves.

It is said several times in the Lost Tales that the Elves of the ancient days were of greater bodily stature than they afterwards became. Thus in The Fall of Gondolin (p. 159): 'The fathers of the fathers of Men were of less stature than Men now are, and the children of Elfinesse of greater growth' in an outline for the abandoned tale of Gilfanon (I.235) very similarly: 'Men were almost of a stature at first with Elves, the fairies being far greater and Men smaller than now' and in citation (4) in the present chapter: "Men and Elves were formerly of a size, though Men always larger." Other passages suggest that the ancient Elves were of their nature of at any rate somewhat slighter build (see pp. 142, 220).

The diminishing in the stature of the Elves of later times is very explicitly related to the coming of Men. Thus in (4) above: "Men spread and thrive, and the Elves of the Great Lands fade. As Men's stature grows theirs diminishes" and in (5): "ever as Men wax more powerful and numerous so the fairies fade and grow small and tenuous, filmy and transparent, but Men larger and more dense and gross. At last Men, or almost all, can no longer see the fairies." The clearest picture that survives of the Elves when they have "faded" altogether is given in the Epilogue (p. 289):

Like strands of wind, like mystic half-transparencies, Gilfanon Lord of Tavrobel rides out tonight amid his folk, and hunts the elfin deer beneath the paling sky. A music of forgotten feet, a gleam of leaves, a sudden bending of the grass, and wistful voices murmuring on the bridge, and they are gone.

But according to the passages bearing on the later "Álfwine" version, the Elves of Tol Eressëa who had left Luthany were unfaded, or had ceased to fade. Thus in (15): "Tol Eressëa, whither most of the unfaded Elves have retired from the noise, war, and clamour of Men" and (16): "Tol Eressëa, whither most of the fading Elves have withdrawn from the world, and there fade now no more" also in Álfwine of England (p. 313): "the unfaded Elves beyond the waters of Garsecg".

On the other hand, when Eriol came to the Cottage of Lost Play the doorward said to him (I.14):

Small is the dwelling, but smaller still are they that dwell here—for all who enter must be very small indeed, or of their own good wish become as very little folk even as they stand upon the threshold.

I have commented earlier (I.32) on the oddity of the idea that the Cottage and its inhabitants were peculiarly small, in an island entirely inhabited by Elves. But my father, if he had ever rewritten The Cottage of Lost Play, would doubtless have abandoned this; and it may well be that he was in any case turning away already at the time of Álfwine II from the idea that the âfadedâ Elves were diminutive, as is suggested by his rejection of the word âlittleâ in âlittle folkâ, âlittle shipsâ (see note 27).

Ultimately, of course, the Elves shed all associations and qualities that would be now commonly considered âfairlylikeâ, and those who remained in the Great Lands in Ages of the world at this time unconceived were to grow greatly in stature and in power: there was nothing filmy or transparent about the heroic or majestic Eldar of the Third Age of Middle-earth. Long afterwards my father would write, in a wrathful comment on a âprettyâ or âladylikeâ pictorial rendering of Legolas:

He was tall as a young tree, lithe, immensely strong, able swiftly to draw a great war-bow and shoot down a Nazgûl, endowed with the tremendous vitality of Elvish bodies, so hard and resistant to hurt that he went only in light shoes over rock or through snow, the most tireless of all the Fellowship.

This brings to an end my rendering and analysis of the early writings bearing on the story of the mariner who came to the Lonely Isle and learned there the true history of the Elves. I have shown, convincingly as I hope, the curious and complex way in which my fatherâs vision of the significance of Tol Eressûa changed. When he jotted down the synopsis (10), the idea of the marinerâs voyage to the Island of the Elves was of course already present; but he journeyed out of the East and the Lonely Isle of his seeking wasâEngland (though not yet the land of the English and not yet lying in the seas where England lies). When later the entire concept was shifted, England, as âLuthanyâ or âLûthienâ, remained preeminently the Elvish land; and Tol Eressûa, with its meads and coppices, its rooksâ nests in the elm-trees of Alalminâ³râ, seemed to the English mariner to be remade in the likeness of his own land, which the Elves had lost at the coming of Men: for it was indeed a re-embodiment of Elvish Luthany far over the sea.

All this was to fall away afterwards from the developing mythology; but Álfwine left many marks on its pages before he too finally disappeared.

Much in this chapter is necessarily inconclusive and uncertain; but I believe that these very early notes and projections are rightly disinterred. Although, as plots, abandoned and doubtless forgotten, they bear witness to truths of my father's heart and mind that he never abandoned. But these notes were scribbled down in his youth, when for him Elvish magic lingered yet mightily in the woods and hills of Luthany in his old age all was gone West-over-sea, and an end was indeed come for the Eldar of story and of song.

NOTES

- 1 On this statement about the stature of Elves and Men see pp. 326â7.
- 2 For the form Taimonto (Taimondo) see I.268, entry Telimektar.
- 3 Belaurin is the Gnomish equivalent of Palârien (see I. 264).
- 4 A side-note here suggests that perhaps the Pine should not be in Tol Eressâa. For Ilwâ, the middle air, that is blue and clear and flows among the stars, see I. 65, 73.
- 5 Gil = Ingil. At the first occurrence of Ingil in this passage the name was written Ingil (Gil), but (Gil) was struck out.
- 6 The word Nautar occurs in a rejected outline for the Tale of the Nauglafring (p. 136), where it is equated with Nauglath (Dwarves).
- 7 Uin: the mightiest and most ancient of whales, chief among those whales and fishes that drew the island-car (afterwards Tol Eressâa) on which Ulmo ferried the Elves to Valinor (I.118â20).
- 8 Gongs: these are evil beings obscurely related to Orcs: see I. 245 note 10, and the rejected outlines for the Tale of the Nauglafring given on pp. 136â7.
- 9 A large query is written against this passage.

- 10 The likeness of this name to Dor Daedeloith is striking, but that is the name of the realm of Morgoth in The Silmarillion, and is interpreted as Land of the Shadow of Horror the old name (whose elements are dai 'sky' and teloth 'roof') has nothing in common with the later except its form.
- 11 Cf. Kortirion among the Trees (I.34, 37, 41): A wave of bowing grass.
- 12 The origin of Warwick according to conventional etymology is uncertain. The element wic, extremely common in English place-names, meant essentially a dwelling or group of dwellings. The earliest recorded form of the name is Wāring wic, and Wāring has been thought to be an Old English word meaning a dam, a derivative from wer, Modern English weir: thus 'dwellings by the weir'.
- 13 Cf. the title-page given in citation (11): Heorrenda of Hālgwudu. No forms of the name of this Staffordshire village are actually recorded from before the Norman Conquest, but the Old English form was undoubtedly hālg-wudu 'enclosed wood' (cf. the High Hay, the great hedge that protected Buckland from the Old Forest in The Lord of the Rings).
- 14 The name Luthany, of a country, occurs five times in Francis Thompson's poem The Mistress of Vision. As noted previously (I.29) my father acquired the Collected Poems of Francis Thompson in 1913¹⁴; and in that copy he made a marginal note against one of the verses that contains the name Luthany though the note is not concerned with the name. But whence Thompson derived Luthany I have no idea. He himself described the poem as 'a fantasy' (Everard Meynell, The Life of Francis Thompson, 1913, p. 237).

This provides no more than the origin of the name as a series of sounds, as with Kā́r from Rider Haggard's She,* or Rohan and Moria mentioned in my father's letter of 1967 on this subject (The Letters of J. R. R.

Tolkien, pp. 383â4), in which he said:

This leads to the matter of âexternal historyâ: the actual way in which I came to light on or choose certain sequences of sound to use as names, before they were given a place inside the story. I think, as I said, this is unimportant: the labour involved in my setting out what I know and remember of the process, or in the guess-work of others, would be far greater than the worth of the results. The spoken forms would simply be mere audible forms, and when transferred to the prepared linguistic situation in my story would receive meaning and significance according to that situation, and to the nature of the story told. It would be entirely delusory to refer to the sources of the sound-combination to discover any meanings overt or hidden.

- 15 The position is complicated by the existence of some narrative outlines of extreme roughness and near-illegibility in which the mariner is named Ælfwine and yet essential elements of âthe Eriol storyâ are present. These I take to represent an intermediate stage. They are very obscure, and would require a great deal of space to present and discuss; therefore I pass them by.
- 16 Cf. p. 264 (xiv).
- 17 Caer GwÃðr: see p. 292.
- 18 It may be mentioned here that when my father read The Fall of Gondolin to the Exeter College Essay Club in the spring of 1920 the mariner was still Eriol, as appears from the notes for his preliminary remarks on that occasion (see Unfinished Tales p. 5). He said here, very strangely, that âEriol lights by accident on the Lonely Islandâ.
- 19 Garsecg (pronounced Garsedge, and so written in Ælfwine A) was one of the many Old English names of the sea.
- 20 In Ælfwine I the land is likewise named LÃºthien, not Luthany. In Ælfwine A, on the other hand, the same distinction is made as in the outlines: âÆlfwine of England (whom the fairies after named LÃºthien (friend) of Luthany (friendship)).âAt this first occurrence (only) of LÃºthien in Ãlfwine II the form Leithian is pencilled above, but LÃºthien is not struck out. The Lay of Leithian was afterwards the title of the long poem of Beren and LÃºthien TinÃºviel.

- 21 The Hill of TÃºn, i.e. the hill on which the city of TÃºn was built: see p. 292.
- 22 Mindon Gwar: see p. 291.
- 23 Ãadgifu: in âthe Eriol storyâ this Old English name (see p. 323) was given as an equivalent to Naimi, Eriolâs wife whom he wedded in Tol EressÃºa (p. 290).
- 24 In Ãlfwine I the text here reads: âby reason of her beauty and goodliness, even as that king of the Franks that was upon a time most mighty among men hath saidââ [sic]. In Ãlfwine II the manuscript in ink stops at âhigh white shoresâ, but after these words my father pencilled in: âeven as that king of the Franks that was in those days the mightiest of earthly kings hath saidââ [sic]. The only clue in Ãlfwine of England to the period of Ãlfwineâs life is the invasion of the Forodwaith (Vikings); the mighty king of the Franks may therefore be Charlemagne, but I have been unable to trace any such reference.
- 25 Evil is emended from Melko. Ãlfwine I does not have the phrase.
- 26 Ãlfwine I has: âwhen the ancient Men of the South from Micelgeard the Heartless Town set their mighty feet upon the soil of LÃºthien.â This text does not have the reference to RÃºm and Magbar. The name Micelgeard is struck through, but Mickleyard is written at the head of the page. Micelgeard is Old English (and Mickleyard a modernisation of this in spelling), though it does not occur in extant Old English writings and is modelled on Old Norse MikligarÃºr (Constantinople).âThe peculiar hostility of the Romans to the Elves of Luthany is mentioned by implication in citation (20), and their disbelief in their existence in (22).

27 The application, frequent in Álfwine I, of álittle to the fairies (Elves) of LÁ°thien and their ships was retained in Álfwine II as first written, but afterwards struck out. Here the word is twice retained, perhaps unintentionally.

28 Elvish is a later emendation of fairy.

29 This sentence, from âsave Álfheahâ, was added later in Álfwine II; it is not in Álfwine I.âThe whole text to this point in Álfwine I and II is compressed into the following in Álfwine A:

Álfwine of England (whom the fairies after named LÁ°thien (friend) of Luthany (friendship)) born of DÁ©or and Áadgifu. Their city burned and DÁ©or slain and Áadgifu dies. Álfwine a thrall of the Winged Helms. He escapes to the Western Sea and takes ship from Belerion and makes great voyages. He is seeking for the islands of the West of which Áadgifu had told him in his childhood.

30 Álfwine I has here: âBut three men could he find as his companions; and OssÃ« took them unto him.â OssÃ« was emended to Neorth; and then the sentence was struck through and rewritten: âSuch found he only three; and those three Neorth after took unto him and their names are not known.â Neorth = Ulmo; see note 39.

31 Álfwine A reads: âHe espies some islands lying in the dawn but is swept thence by great winds. He returns hardly to Belerion. He gathers the seven greatest mariners of England; they sail in spring. They are wrecked upon the isles of Álfwineâs desire and find them desert and lonely and filled with gloomy whispering trees.â This is at variance with Álfwine I and II where Álfwine is cast on to the island alone; but agrees with II in giving Álfwine seven companions, not three.

32 A clue that this was Ulmo: cf. The Fall of Gondolin (p. 155): âhe was shod with mighty shoes of stone.â

- 33 In Álfrwine A they were âfilled with gloomy whispering treesâ (note 31).
- 34 From the point where the Man of the Sea said: âLo, this is one of the ring of Harbourless Islesâ (p. 317) to here (i.e. the whole episode of the foundered Viking ship and its captain Orm, slayer of *Álfrwine*âs father) there is nothing corresponding in Álfrwine I, which has only: âbut that Man of the Sea aided him in building a little craft, and together, guided by the solitary mariner, they fared away and came to a land but little known.â For the narrative in Álfrwine A see note 39.
- 35 At one occurrence of the name Ythlings (Old English $\tilde{A}^{1/2}\tilde{A}^{\circ}$ âwaveâ) in Álfrwine I it is written Ythlingas, with the Old English plural ending.
- 36 The Shipmen of the West: emendation from Eneathrim.
- 37 Cf. in the passage of alliterative verse in my fatherâs On Translating Beowulf (The Monsters and the Critics and Other Essays, 1983, p. 63): then away thrust her to voyage gladly valiant-timbered.
- 38 The whole section of the narrative concerning the island of the Ythlings is more briefly told in Álfrwine I (though, so far as it goes, in very much the same words) with several features of the later story absent (notably the cutting of timber in the grove sacred to Ulmo, and the blessing of the ship by the Man of the Sea). The only actual difference of structure, however, is that whereas in Álfrwine II Álfrwine finds again his seven companions in the land of the Ythlings, and sails west with them, together with Bior of the Ythlings, in Álfrwine I they were indeed drowned, and he got seven companions from among the Ythlings (among whom Bior is not named).
- 39 The plot-outline Álfrwine A tells the story from the point where Álfrwine and his seven companions were cast on the Isle of the Man of the Sea (thus differing from Álfrwine I and II, where he came there alone) thus:

They wander about the island upon which they have been cast and come upon many decaying wrecks—often of mighty ships, some treasure-laden. They find a solitary cabin beside a lonely sea, built of old ship-wood, where dwells a solitary and strange old mariner of dread aspect. He tells them these are the Harbourless Isles whose enchanted rocks draw all ships thither, lest men fare over far upon Garsedge [see note 19]—and they were devised at the Hiding of Valinor. Here, he says, the trees are magical. They learn many strange things about the western world of him and their desire is whetted for adventure. He aids them to cut holy trees in the island groves and to build a wonderful vessel, and shows them how to provision it against a long voyage (that water that drieth not save when heart fails, &c.). This he blesses with a spell of adventure and discovery, and then dives from a cliff-top. They suspect it was Neorth Lord of Waters.

They journey many years among strange western islands hearing often many strange reports—of the belt of Magic Isles which few have passed; of the trackless sea beyond where the wind bloweth almost always from the West; of the edge of the twilight and the far-glimpsed isle there standing, and its glimmering haven. They reach the magic island [read islands?] and three are enchanted and fall asleep on the shore.

The others beat about the waters beyond and are in despair—for as often as they make headway west the wind changes and bears them back. At last they tryst to return on the morrow if nought other happens. The day breaks chill and dull, and they lie becalmed looking in vain through the pouring rain.

This narrative differs from both Álfrwine I and II in that here there is no mention of the Ythlings; and Álfrwine and his seven companions depart on their long western voyage from the Harbourless Isle of the ancient mariner. It agrees with Álfrwine I in the name Neorth; but it foreshadows II in the cutting of sacred trees to build a ship.

40 In Álfrwine I Álfrheah does not appear, and his two speeches in this passage are there given to one Gelimer. Gelimer (Geilamir) was the name of a king of the Vandals in the sixth century.

- 41 In Álfwine I Biorâs speech is given to Gelimer (see note 40).
- 42 Álfwine I ends in almost the same words as Álfwine II, but with a most extraordinary difference; Álfwine does not leap overboard, but returns with his companions to Belerion, and so never comes to Tol Eressâ!â Very empty thereafter were the places of Men for Álfwine and his mariners, and of their seed have been many restless and wistful folk since they were dead!â Moreover my father seems clearly to have been going to say the same in Álfwine II, but stopped, struck out what he had written, and introduced the sentence in which Álfwine leapt into the sea. I cannot see any way to explain this.

Álfwine A ends in much the same way as Álfwine II:

As night comes on a little breath springs up and the clouds lift. They hoist sail to returnâwhen suddenly low down in the dusk they see the many lights of the Haven of Many Hues twinkle forth. They row thither, and hear sweet music. Then the mist wraps all away and the others rousing themselves say it is a mirage born of hunger, and with heavy hearts prepare to go back, but Álfwine plunges overboard and swims into the dark until he is overcome in the waters, and him seems death envelops him. The others sail away home and are out of the tale.

- 43 Literally, as he maintained: âFrom that (grief) one moved on; from this in the same way one can move on.â
- 44 There are long roots beneath the words of The Fellowship of the Ring (I.2): âElvesâ could now be seen passing westward through the woods in the evening, passing and not returning; but they were leaving Middle-earth and were no longer concerned with its troubles.â âThat isnât anything new, if you believe the old tales,â said Ted Sandyman, when Sam Gamgee spoke of the matter.

I append here a synopsis of the structural differences between the three versions of Ålfwine of England.

Å

A: Å. sails from Belerion and sees islands in the dawn.

I: As in A

II: As in A, but his companion Ålfheah is named.

Å

A: Å. sails again with 7 mariners of England. They are shipwrecked on the isle of the Man of the Sea but all survive.

I: Å. has only 3 companions, and he alone survives the shipwreck.

II: Å. has 7 companions, and is alone on the isle of the Man of the Sea, believing them drowned.

Å

A: The Man of the Sea helps them to build a ship but does not go with them.

I: The Man of the Sea helps Å. to build a boat and goes with him.

II: Å. and the Man of the Sea find a stranded Viking ship and sail away in it together.

Å

A: The Man of the Sea dives into the sea from a cliff-top of his isle.

I: They come to the Isle of the Ythlings. The Man of the Sea dives from a cliff-top. Å. gets 7 companions from the Ythlings.

II: As in I, but Å. finds his 7 companions from England, who were not drowned; to them is added Bior of the Ythlings.

Å

A: On their voyages 3 of Å's companions are enchanted in the Magic Isles.

I: As in A, but in this case they are Ythlings.

II: As in A

Å

A: They are blown away from Tol EressÅ«a after sighting it; Å. leaps overboard, and the others return home.

I: They are blown away from Tol Eressëa, and all, including Æ, return home.

II: As in A

Changes made to names, and differences in names, in the texts of *Álfwine of England

Láthien The name of the land in I and II; in A Luthany (see note 20).

Dæor At the first occurrence only in I Dæor < Heorrenda, subsequently Dæor; A Dæor.

Evadrien In I < Erenol. Erenol = Iron Cliff see I.252, entry Eriol. Forodwaith II has Forodwaith < Forwaith < Gwasgonin; I has Gwasgonin or the Winged Helms; A has the Winged Helms.

Outer Land < Outer Lands at both occurrences in II (pp. 316â17).

Álfheah I has Gelimer (at the first occurrence only < Helgor).

Shipmen of the West In II < Eneathrim.

APPENDIX

NAMES IN THE LOST TALESâPART II

This appendix is designed only as an adjunct and extension to that in Part One. Names that have already been studied in Part One are not given entries in the following notes, if there are entries under that name in Part One, e.g. Melko, Valinor; but if, as is often the case, the etymological information in Part One is contained in an entry under some other name, this is shown, e.g. âGilim See I.260 (Melko)â.

Linguistic information from the Name-list to The Fall of Gondolin (see p. 148) incorporated in these notes is referred to âNFGâ. âGLâ and âQLâ refer to the Gnomish and Qenya dictionaries (see I. 246ff.). Qenya is the term used in both these books and is strictly the name of the language spoken in Tol Eressâ«; it does not appear elsewhere in the early writings, where the distinction is between âGnomishâ on the one hand and âElfinâ, âEldarâ, or âEldarissâ on the other.

Â

AlqarÃ;mÃ« For the first element Qenya alqa âswanâ see I.249 (AlqaluntÃ«). Under root RAHA QL gives rÃ« âarmâ, rakta âstretch out, reachâ, rÃjma âwingâ, rÃjma âhaving wingsâ GL has ram âwing, pinionâ, and it is noted that Qenya rÃjma is a confusion of this and a word rÃ³ma âshoulderâ.

Amon Gwareth Under root AM(u) âup(wards)â QL gives amu âup(wards)â, amu- âraiseâ, amuntÃ« âsunriseâ, amun(d) âhillâ GL has am âup(wards)â, amon âhill, mountâ, adverb âuphillâ. GL gives the name as Amon âWareth âHill of Wardâ, also gwareth âwatch, guard, wardâ, from the stem gwar-âwatchâ seen also in the name of Tinfang Warble (Gwarbilin âBirdwardâ, I.268). See Glamhoth, Gwarestrin.

Angorodin See I. 249 (Angamandi) and I. 256 (KalormÃ«).

Arlisgion GL gives Garlisgion (see I.265 (Sirion)), as also does NFG, which has entries â*Garlisgion* was our name, saith Elfrith, for the Place of Reeds which is its interpretationâ, and âlîsg is a reed (*lîsk*Ã«)â. GL has lîsg, lîsc âreed, sedgeâ, and QL *lîsk*Ã« with the same meaning. For gar see I. 251 (Dor Faidwen).

Artanor GL has athra âacross, athwartâ, athron adverb âfurther, beyondâ, athrod âcrossing, fordâ (changed later to adr(a), adron, adros). With athra, adr(a) is compared Qenya arta. Cf. also the name Dor Athro (p. 41). It is clear that both Artanor and Dor Athro meant âthe Land Beyondâ. Cf. Sarnathrod.

Asgon An entry in NFG says: âAsgon A lake in the âLand of Shadowsâ Dor LÃ³min, by the Elves named Aksan.â

Ausir GL gives avos âfortune, wealth, prosperity,â avosir, Ausir âthe same (personified)â also ausin ârichâ, aus(s)aith or avosaith âavariceâ. Under root AWA in QL are *aut*Ã« âprosperity, wealth; richâ, *ausi*Ã«; âwealthâ.

Â

Bablon See p. 214.

Bad Uthwen Gnomish uthwen âway out, exit, escapeâ, see I.251 (Dor Faidwen). The entry in NFG says: â*Bad Uthwen* [emended from Uswen] meaneth but âway of escapeâ and is in Eldarissa *Uswewand*Ã«.â For *vand*Ã« see I.264 (Qalvanda).

Balcmeq In NFG it is said that Balcmeq âwas a great fighter among the Orclim (Orqui say the Elves) who fell to the axe of Tuorââtis in meaning âheart of evilâ.â (For-lim in Orclim see Gondothlim.) The entry for Balrog in NFG says: â*Bal* meaneth evilness, and Balc evil, and Balrog meaneth evil demon.â GL has balc âcruelâ: see I.250 (Balrog).

Bansil For the entry in NFG, where this name is translated âFair-gleamâ, see p. 214; and for the elements of the name see I.272 (VÃªna) and I.265 (Sil).

Belaurin See I.264 (PalÃªrien).

Belcha See I.260 (Melko). NFG has an entry: â*Belca* Though here [i.e. in the Tale] of overwhelming custom did Bronweg use the elfin names, this was the name aforetime of that evil Ainu.â

Beleg See I. 254 (*Haloisi Velik*Ã«).

Belegost For the first element see Beleg. GL gives ost âenclosure, yardâtownâ, also oss âouter wall, town wallâ, osta-âsurround with walls, fortifyâ, ostor âenclosure, circuit of wallsâ. QL under root OSO has os(t) âhouse, cottageâ, osta âhomesteadâ, ostar âtownshipâ, ossa âwall and moatâ.

bo- A late entry in GL: â*bo (bon)* (cf. Qenya vÃ´, vondo âsonâ) as patronymic prefix, bo-bon- âson ofâ as an example is given Tuor bo-Beleg. There is also a word bÃ´r âdescendantâ. See go-, Indorion.

Bodruith In association with bod- âback, againâ GL has the words bodruith âvengeanceâ, bodruithol âvengeful (by nature)â, bodruithog âthirsting for vengeanceâ, but these were struck out. There is also gruith âdeed of horror, violent act, vengeanceâ.âIt may be that Bodruith Lord of Belegost was supposed to have received his name from the events of the Tale of the Nauglafring.

Â

CÃ³pas Alqalunten See I.257 (KÃ³pas) and I. 249 (AlqaluntÃ³).

Cris Ilbrantelo GL gives the group crisc âsharpâ, criss âcleft, gash, gullyâ, crist âknifeâ, crista- âslash, cut, sliceâ NFG: â*Cris* meaneth much as doth falc, a cleft, ravine, or narrow way of waters with high wallsâ. QL under root KIRI âcut, splitâ has kiris âcleft, crackâ and other words.

For ilbrant ârainbowâ see I. 256 (Ilweran). The final element is telo âroofing, canopyâ: see I.267â8 (Teleri).

Cristhorn For Cris see Cris Ilbrantelo, and for thorn see I.266 (Sorontur). In NFG is the entry: â*Cris Thorn* is Eaglesâ Cleft or Sornekiris.â

Cuilwarthon For cuil see I. 257 (KoiviÃ³-nÃ³ni); the second element is not explained.

CÃ³m an-Idrisaith For cÃ³m âmoundâ see I.250 (CÃ³m a Gumlaith). Idrisaith is thus defined in GL: of âcf. avosaith, but that means avarice, money-greed, but idrisaith = excessive love of gold and gems and beautiful and costly thingsâ (for avosaith see Ausir). Related words are idra âdear, preciousâ, idra âto value, prizeâ, idri (Ã³d) âa treasure, a jewelâ, idril âsweetheartâ (see Idril).

Curufin presumably contains curu âmagicâ see I.269 (Tolli Kuruvar).

Â

Dairon GL includes this name but without etymological explanation: âDairon the fluter (Qenya Sairon).â See Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va below.

Danigwiel In GL the Gnomish form is Danigwethil; see I.266 (Taniquetil). NFG has an entry: â*Danigwethil* do the Gnomes call Taniquetil; but seek for tales concerning that mountain rather in the elfin name.â

(bo-)Dhrauthodavros â(Son of) the weary forestâ. Gnomish drauth âweary, toilwornâ, drauthos âtoil, wearinessâ, drautha-âto be wearyâ for the second element tavros see I.267 (Tavari).

Dor Athro See Artanor, Sarnathrod.

Dor-na-Dhaideloth For Gnomish dai âskyâ see I.268 (Telimektar), and for teloth âroofing, canopyâ see ibid. (Teleri); cf. Cris Ilbranteloth.

Dramborleg NFG has the following entry: â*Dramborleg* (or as it may be named Drambor) meaneth in its full form Thudder-sharp, and was the axe of Tuor that smote both a heavy dint as of a club and cleft as a sword; and the Eldar say Tarambor or Tarambolaike.â QL gives Tarambor, Tarambolaike âTuorâs axeâ under root TARA, TARAMA, âbatter, thud, beat,â with taran, tarambo âbuffetâ, and taru âhornâ (included here with a query: see Taruithorn). No Gnomish equivalents are cited in GL.

The second element is Gnomish leg, lÃ©g âkeen, piercingâ, Qenya laika; cf. Legolast âkeen-sightâ, I. 267 (TÃ©ri-Laisi).

Duilin NFG has the following entry: â*Duilin* whose name meaneth Swallow was the lord of that house of the Gondothlim whose sign was the swallow and was surest of the archers of the EldaliÃ©, but fell in the fall of Gondolin. Now the names of those champions appear but in Noldorissa, seeing that Gnomes they were, but his name would be in Eldarissa Tuilindo, and that of his house (which the Gnomes called Nos Duilin) NossÃ© Tuilinda.â Tuilindo â(spring-singer), swallowâ is given in QL, see I.269 (TuilÃ©rÃ©); GL has duilin(g) âswallowâ, with duil, duilir âSpringâ, but these last were struck through and in another part of the book appear tuil, tuilir âSpringâ (see I.269).

For nossÃ© âkin, peopleâ see I.272 (Valinor); GL does not give nos in this sense, but has nosta- âbe bornâ, nost âbirth; blood, high birth; birthdayâ, and noss (changed to nÃ©s) âbirthdayâ. Cf. Nostna-Lothion âthe Birth of Flowersâ, Nos Galdon, Nos nan Alwen.

Â

EÃrÃjmÃ« For ea âeagleâ see I.251 (EÃrendel), and for rÃjmÃ« see AlqarÃjmÃ«. GL has an entry Iorothrarn, -urn âQenya EÃrÃjmÃ« or Eaglepinion, a name of one of EÃrendelâs boatsâ. For Gnomish ior, ioroth âeagleâ see I.251 (EÃrendel), and cf. the forms Earam, Earum as the name of the ship (pp. 260, 276).

EÃrendel See pp. 266â7 and I.251.

EÃrendilyon See I.251 (EÃrendel), and Indorion.

Ecthelion Both GL and NFG derive this name from ecthel âfountainâ, to which corresponds Qenya ektelÃ«. (This latter survived: cf. the entry kel- in the Appendix to The Silmarillion: âfrom et-kelÃ âissue of water, springâ was derived, with transposition of the consonants, Qenya ehtelÃ«, Sindarin eithelâ. A later entry in GL gives aithil (< ektl) âa springâ.)âA form kektelÃ« is also found in Qenya from root KELE, KELU: see I.257 (Kelusindi).

Egalthoth NFG has the following entry: â*Egalthoth* is a great name, yet none know clearly its meaningâsome have said its bearer was so named in that he was worth a thousand Elves (but RÃmil says nay) and others that it signifies the mighty shoulders of that Gnome, and so saith RÃmil, but perchance it was woven of a secret tongue of the Gondothlimâ (for the remainder of this entry see p. 215). For Gnomish moth â1000â see I.270 (Uin).

GL interprets the name as RÃmil did, deriving it from alm (< alÃam-) âthe broad of the back from shoulder to shoulder, back, shouldersâ, hence Egalthoth = âBroadshoulderâ the name in Qenya is said to be Aikaldamor, and an entry in QL of the same date gives aika âbroad, vastâ, comparing Gnomish eg, egrin. These in turn GL glosses as âfar away, wide, distantâ and âwide, vast, broad; farâ (as in Egla; see I.251 (Eldar)).

Eglamar See I.251 (Eldamar). NFG has the following entry: âEgla said the son of Bronweg was the Gnome name of the Eldar (now but seldom used) who dwelt in KÃr, and they were called Eglothrim [emended from Eglothlim] (that is EldaliÃ«), and their tongue Lam Eglathon or Egladrin. RÃmil said these names Egla and Elda were akin, but Elfrith cared not overmuch for such lore and they seem not over alike. With this cf. I. 251 (Eldar). GL gives lam âtongueâ, and lambÃ is found in QL: a word that survived into later Quenya. In QL it is given as a derivative of root LAVA âlickâ, and defined âtongue (of body, but also of land, or even = âspeechâ).

Eldarissa appears in QL (âthe language of the Eldarâ) but without explanation of the final element. Possibly it was derived from the root ISI: ista âknowâ, issÃ âknowledge, loreâ, iswa, isqa âwiseâ, etc.

Elfrith See pp. 201â2, and I.255 (Ilverin).

ElmavoitÃ âOne-handedâ (Beren). See Ermabwed.

Elwing GL has the following entry: â*Ailwing* older spelling of Elwing = âlake foamâ. As a noun = âwhite water-lilyâ. The name of the maiden loved by Ioringliâ (Ioringli = EÃrendel, see I.251). The first element appears in the words ail âlake, poolâ, ailion âlakeâ, Qenya ailo, *ailin*âcf. later Aelin-uial. The second element is gwing âfoamâ: see I. 273 (Wingilot).

Erenol See I.252 (Eriol).

Ermabwed âOne-handedâ (Beren). GL gives mab âhandâ, amabwed, mabwed âhaving handsâ, mabwedri âdexterityâ, mabol âskilfulâ, mablios âcunningâ, mablad, mablod âpalm of handâ, mabrin(d) âwristâ. A related word in Qenya was said in GL to be mapa (root MAPA) âseizeâ, but this statement was struck out. QL has also a root MAHA with many derivatives, notably mÃ (= maha) âhandâ, mavoitÃ âhaving handsâ (cf. ElmavoitÃ).

Â

Faiglindra âLong-tressedâ (Airin). Gnomish faigli âhair, long tresses (especially used of women)â faiglion âhaving long hairâ, and faiglim of the same meaning, âespecially as a proper nameâ, Faiglim, Aurfaiglim âthe Sun at noonâ. With this is bracketed the word faiglin(d)ra.

Failivrin Together with fail âpale, pallidâ, failthi âpallorâ, and Failin a name of the Moon, GL gives Failivrin: â(1) a maid beloved by Silmo; (2) a name among the Gnomes of many maidens of great beauty, especially Failivrin of the Rothwarin in the Tale of Turumart.â (In the Tale Rothwarin was replaced by Rodothlim.)

The second element is brin, Qenya vĀrin, âa magic glassy substance of great lucency used in fashioning the Moon. Used of things of great and pure transparency.â For vĀrin see I.192â3.

Falasquil Three entries in NFG refer to this name (for falas see also I.253 (Falman)):

â*Falas* meaneth (even as falas or falassĀ« in Eldar) a beach.â

â*Falas-a-Gwilb* the âbeach of peaceâ was Falasquil in Elfin where Tuor at first dwelt in a sheltered cove by the Great Sea.â -a-Gwilb is struck through and above is written, apparently, â*Wilb* or Wilma.

â*Gwilb* meaneth âfull of peaceâ, which is gwilm.â

GL gives gwĀl, gwilm, gwilthi âpeaceâ, and gwilb âquiet, peacefulâ.

Fangluin âBluebeardâ. See Indrafang. For luin âblueâ see I.262 (Nielluin).

FoalĀ³kĀ« Under a root FOHO âhide, hoard, store upâ QL gives foa âhoard, treasureâ, foina âhiddenâ, fĀ¹lĀ« âsecrecy, a secretâ, fĀ¹lima âsecretiveâ, and foalĀ³kĀ« âname of a serpent that guarded a treasureâ. lĀ³kĀ« âsnakeâ is derived from a root LOKO âtwine, twist, curlâ.

GL originally had entries fĀ», fĀ»l, fĀ»n âhoardâ, fĀ»lug âa dragon (who guards treasure)â, and ulug âwolfâ. By later changes this construction was altered to fuis âhoardâ, fuithlug.-og (the form that appears in the text, p. 70), ulug âdragonâ (cf. Qenya lĀ³kĀ«). An entry in NFG reads: â*lĀ*»g is lĀ³kĀ« of the Eldar, and meaneth âdrakeâ.â

FĀ¹sâAlmir (Earlier name of Faskala-nĀ⁹men; translated in the text (p. 115) âthe bath of flameâ.) For fĀ¹s âbathâ see I.253 (FaskalanĀ⁹men). GL gives three names: â*FĀ¹s Aura*, FĀ¹sâAlmir, and FĀ¹s na Ngalmir, i.e. Sunâs bath = the Western Sea.â For Galmir, Aur, names of the Sun, see I.254 and I.271 (Ār).

Fuithlug See FoalĀ³kĀ«.

Â

Galdor For the entry in NFG concerning Galdor see p. 215; as first written galdon was there said to mean âtreeâ, and Galdorâs people to be named Nos Galdon. Galdon is not in GL. Subsequently galdon > alwen, and alwen does appear in GL, as a word of poetic vocabulary: alwen â = ornâ.âCf. Qenya alda âtreeâ (see I.249 (Aldaron)), and the later relationship Qenya alda, Sindarin galadh.

Gar Thurion NFG has the earlier form Gar Furion (p. 202), and GL has furn, furion âsecret, concealedâ, also fÃr âa lieâ (Qenya furu) and fur- âto conceal; to lieâ. QL has furin and hurin âhidden, concealedâ (root FURU or HURU). With Thurion cf. Thuringwethil âWoman of Secret Shadowâ, and Thurin âthe Secretâ, Finduilas âname for TÃrin (Unfinished Tales pp. 157, 159).

Gil See I. 256 (Ingil).

Gilim See I. 260 (Melko).

Gimli GL has gimli â(sense of) hearingâ, with *gim-*âhearâ, gimriol âattentiveâ (changed to âaudibleâ), gimri âhearkening, attentionâ. The hearing of Gimli, the captive Gnome in the dungeons of Tevildo, âwas the keenest that has been in the worldâ (p. 29).

Glamhoth GL defines this as âname given by the Goldothrim to the Orcin: People of Dreadful Hateâ (cf. âfolk of dreadful hateâ, p. 160). For Goldothrim see I. 262 (Noldoli). The first element is glÃm âhatred, loathingâ other words are glamri âbitter feudâ, glamog âloathsomelyâ. An entry in NFG says: â*Glam* meaneth âfierce hateâ and even as Gwar has no kindred words in Eldar.â

For hoth âfolkâ see I.264 (orchoth in entry Orc), and cf. Goldothrim, Gondothlim, RÃmhoth, Thornhoth. Under root HOSO QL gives hos âfolkâ, hossÃ âarmy, band, troopâ, hostar âtribeâ, horma âhorde, hostâ also Sankossi âthe Goblinsâ, equivalent of Gnomish Glamhoth, and evidently compounded of sankÃ âhatefulâ (root SNK ârend, tearâ) and hossÃ.

Glend Perhaps connected with Gnomish glenn âthin, fineâ, glendrin âslenderâ, glendrinios âslendernessâ, glent, glentweth âthinnessâ Qenya root LENE âlongâ, which developed its meaning in different directions: âslow, tedious, trailingâ, and âstretch, thinâ: lenka âslowâ, lenwa âlong and thin, straight, narrowâ, lenu- âstretchâ, etc.

Glingol For the entry in NFG, where the name is translated âsinging-goldâ, see p. 216; and see I.258 (Lindelors). The second element is culu âgoldâ, for which see I.255 (Ilsalunt); another entry in NFG reads: â*Culu* or Culon is a name we have in poesy for Glor (and *R*âmil saith that it is the Elfin Kulu, and -gol in our Glingol).â

Glorfalc For glor see I.258 (Laurelin). NFG has an entry: â*Glor* is gold and is that word that cometh in verse of the Kâ'r-Eldar *laur*â« (so saith *R*âmil).â

Falc is glossed in GL â(1) cleft, gash; (2) cleft, ravine, cliffsâ (also given is falcon âa great two-handed sword, twibillâ, which was changed to falchon, and so close to English falchion âbroadswordâ). NFG has: â*Falc* is cleft and is much as Cris; being Elfin Falqa and under root *F*â~~L~~â~~L~~ in QL are falqa âcleft, mountain pass, ravineâ and falqan âlarge swordâ. GL has a further entry: Glorfalc âa great ravine leading out of Gariothâ. Garioth is here used of Hisilâ³mâ« see I.252 (Eruman). Cf. later Orfalch Echor.

Glorfindel For the entry in NFG, where the name is rendered âGoldtressâ, see p. 216. For glor see I.258 (Laurelin), and Glorfalc. GL had an entry findel âlock of hairâ, together with fith (fidhin) âa single hairâ, fidhra âhairyâ, but findel was struck out; later entries are finn âlock of hairâ (see fin- in the Appendix to The Silmarillion) and finl or finnil âtressâ. NFG: â*Finndel* is âtressâ, and is the Elfin Findil.â Under root FIRI QL gives findl âlock of hairâ and fin âray of the sunâ.

In another place in GL the name Glorfindel was given, and translated âGoldlocksâ, but it was changed later to Glorfinn, with a variant Glorfinl.

Glorund For glor see I.258 (Laurelin), and Glorfalc. GL gives Glorunn âthe great drake slain by Turumartâ. Neither of the Qenya forms Laurundo, *Undolaur*â« (p. 84) appear in QL, which gives an earlier name for âthe great wormâ, Fentor, together with fent âserpentâ, *fenum*â« âdragonâ. As this entry was first written it read âthe great worm slain by Ingilmoâ to this was added âor Turambarâ.

Golosbrindi (Earlier name of Hirilorn, rendered in the text (p. 51) âQueen of the Forestâ.) A word goloth âforestâ is given in GL, derived from gw*â~~o~~loth, which is itself composed of aloth (alos), a verse word meaning âforestâ (= taur), and the prefix ngua* > gwa, unaccented go, âtogether, in oneâ, âoften used merely intensivelyâ. The corresponding word in Qenya is said to be mÃ;los, which does not appear in QL.

Gondobar See Gondolin, and for -bar see I.251 (Eldamar). In GL the form Gondobar was later changed to Gonthobar.

Gondolin To the entries cited in I.254 may be added that in NFG: â*Gond* meaneth a stone, or stone, as doth Elfin on and ondo.â For the statement about Gondolin (where the name is rendered âstone of songâ) in NFG see p. 216; and for the latest formulation of the etymology of Gondolin see the Appendix to The Silmarillion, entry gond.

Gondothlim GL has the following entry concerning the word lim âmanyâ, Qenya limbÃ« (not in QL): âIt is frequently suffixed and so becomes a second plural inflexion. In the singular it = English âmany â, as golda-lim. It is however most often suffixed to the plural in those nouns making their plural in -th. It then changes to -rim after -l. Hence great confusion with grim âhostâ and thlim âraceâ, as in Goldothrim (âthe people of the Gnomesâ).â NFG has an entry: â*Gondothlim* meaneth âfolk of stoneâ and (saith RÃºmil) is Gond âstoneâ, whereto be added Hoth âfolkâ and that -lim we Gnomes add after to signify âthe manyâ.â Cf. Lothlim, Rodothlim, and Orclim in entry Balcmeq; for hoth see Glamhoth.

Gondothlimbar See Gondolin, Gondothlim, and for -bar see I.251 (Eldamar). In GL the form Gondothlimbar was later changed to â*Gonthoflimar* or *Gonnothlimar*â.

go- An original entry in GL, later struck out, was: gon-go- âson of, patronymic prefix (cf. suffix ios/ion/io and Qenya yÃ, yondo)â. The replacement for this is given above under bo-. See Indorion.

Gon Indor See go-, Indorion.

Gothmog See pp. 67, 216, and I.258 (Kosomot). GL has mog- âdetest, hateâ, mogri âdetestationâ, mogrin âhatefulâ Qenya root MOKO âhateâ. In addition to goth âwar, strifeâ (Qenya root KOSO âstriveâ) may be noted gothwen âbattleâ, gothweg âwarriorâ, gothwin âAmazonâ, gothriol âwarlikeâ, gothfeng âwar-arrowâ, gothwilm âarmisticeâ.

Gurtholfin GL: Gurtholfin âUrdolwen, a sword of Turambarâs, Wand of Deathâ. Also given is gurthu âdeathâ (Qenya urdu; not in QL). The second element of the name is olfin(g) (also olf) âbranch, wand, stickâ (Qenya olwen(n)).

It may be noted that in QL Turambarâs sword is given as Sangahyando âcleaver of throngsâ, from roots SANGA âpack tight, pressâ (sanga âthrongâ) and HYARA âplough throughâ (hyar âploughâ, hyanda âblade, shareâ). Sangahyando âThrong-cleaverâ survived to become the name of a man in Gondor (see the Appendix to The Silmarillion, entry thang).

Gwar See I.257 (KÃr, korin).

Gwarestrin Rendered in the Tale (p. 158) as âTower of Guardâ, and so also in NFG; GL glosses it âwatchtower (especially as a name of Gondolin)â. A late entry in GL gives estirin, estirion, estrin âpinnacleâ, beside esc âsharp point, sharp edgeâ. The second element of this word is tiri(o)n; see I.258 (Kortirion). For gwar see Amon Gwareth.

Gwedheling See I.273 (Wendelin).

Â

Heborodin âThe Encircling Hills.â Gnomish preposition heb âaround about, aroundâ hebrim âboundaryâ, hebwirol âcircumspectâ. For orod see I.256 (KalormÃ).

Hirilorn GL gives hiril âqueen (a poetic use), princess; feminine of *bridhon*â. For bridhon see Tevildo. The second element is orn âtreeâ. (It may be mentioned here that the word neldor âbeechâ is found in QL; see the Appendix to The Silmarillion, entry neldor).

Â

Idril For Gnomish idril âsweetheartâ see CÃm an-Idrisaith. There is another entry in GL as follows: Idhril âa girlâs name often confused with Idril. Idril = âbelovedâ but Idhril = âmortal maidenâ. Both appear to have been the names of the daughter of Turgonâor apparently Idril was the older and the Kor-eldar called her IrildÃ (= Idhril) because she married Tuor.â Elsewhere in GL appear idhrin âmen, earth-dwellers; especially used as a folk-name contrasted with Eglath etc.; cf. Qenya indiâ, and Idhru, Idhrubar âthe world, all the regions inhabited by Men; cf. Qenya irminâ. In QL these words indi and irmin are given under root IRI âdwell?â, with irin âtownâ, indo âhouseâ, indor âmaster of houseâ (see Indor), etc.; but IrildÃ does not appear. Similar words are found in Gnomish: ind, indos âhouse, hallâ, indor âmaster (of house), lordâ.

After the entry in NFG on Idril which has been cited (p.

216) a further note was added: "and her name meaneth Beloved", but often do Elves say Idhril which more rightly compares with Irildë and that meaneth "mortal maiden", and perchance signifies her wedding with Tuor son of Men. An isolated note (written in fact on a page of the Tale of the Nauglafring) says: "Alter name of Idril to Idhril. The two were confused: Idril = "beloved", Idril = "maiden of mortals". The Elves thought this her name and called her Irildë (because she married Tuor Pelethron)."â Ilbranteloth See Cris Ilbranteloth.

Ilfiniol, Ilfrith See I.255 (Ilverin).

Ilëvatar An entry in NFG may be noticed here: "En do the mystic sayings of the Noldoli also name Ilathon [emended from Ad Ilon], who is Ilëvatar"and this is like the Eldar Enu.â QL gives Enu, the Almighty Creator who dwells without the world. For Ilathon see I.255â6 (Ilwë).

Indor (Father of Tuorâs father Peleg). This is perhaps the word indor "master (of house), lord" (see Idril) used as a proper name.

Indorion See go-. QL gives yë, yond- as poetic words for "son", adding: "but very common as -ion in patronymics (and hence practically = "descendant")â also yondo "male descendant, usually (great) grandson" (cf. Eërendelâs name Gon Indor). Cf. Eërendilyon.

Indrafang GL has indra "along (also used of time)"â, indraluin "along ago"â also indravang "a special name of the nauglath or dwarves", on which see p. 247. These forms were changed later to in(d)ra, in(d)rafang, in(d)raluin/idhraluin.

An original entry in GL was bang "beard" = Qenya vanga, but this was struck out; and another word with the same meaning as Indravang was originally entered as Bangasur but changed to Fangasur. The second element of this is së "long, trailing", Qenya së³ra, and a later addition here is Surfang "a long-beard, a naugla or inrafang". Cf. Fangluin, and later Fangorn "Treebeard".

Irildë See Idril.

Isfin NFG has this entry: "Isfin was the sister of Turgon Lord of Gondolin, whom Eärl at length wedded; and it meaneth either âsnow-locksâ or âexceeding-cunningâ.â Long afterwards my father, noting that Isfin was âderived from the earliest (1916) form of *The Fall of Gondolin*â, said that the name was âmeaninglessâ but with the second element cf. finn âlock of hairâ (see Glorfindel) or fim âcleverâ, finthi âidea, notionâ, etc. (see I.253 (Finwë)).

IvÄjrÄ GL gives Ior âthe famous âpiper of the seaâ, Qenya *IvÄjrÄ*â.

Äverin A late entry in GL gives Aivrin or Aivrien âan island off the west coast of Tol EressÄa, Qenya Äverin or Iverindor.â QL has Äverind- âIrelandâ.

Ä

Karkaras In GL this is mentioned as the Qenya form; the Gnomish name of âthe great wolf-warden of Belcaâs doorâ was Carcaloth or Carcamoth, changed to Carchaloth, Carchamoth. The first element is carc âjag, point, fangâ QL under root K^RK^R has karka âfang, tooth, tuskâ, karkassÄ, karkaras ârow of spikes or teethâ.

Kosmoko See Gothmog.

KurÄki See I.269 (Tolli Kuruvar).

Ä

Ladwen-na-Dhaideloth âHeath of the Sky-roofâ. See Dor-na-Dhaideloth. GL gives ladwen â(1) levelness, flatness; (2) a plain, heath; (3) a plane; (4) surface.â Other words are ladin âlevel, smooth; fair, equableâ (cf. Tumladin), lad âa levelâ (cf. mablad âpalm of handâ mentioned under Ermabwed), lada âto smooth out, stroke, soothe, beguileâ, and ladwinios âequityâ. There are also words bladwen âa plainâ (see I.264 (PalÄrien)), and fladwen âmeadowâ (with flad âswardâ and Fladweth Amrod (Amrog) âNomadâs Greenâ, âa place in Tol Erethrin where Eriol sojourned a while; nigh to Tavrobel.â Amrog, amrod = âwandererâ, âwanderingâ, from amra- âgo up and down, live in the mountains, wanderâ see Amon Gwareth).

LaiqalassÄ See I.267 (TÄjri-laisi), I.254 (Gar Lossion).

Laurundo See Glorund.

Legolas See LaiqalassÄ.

LindeloktÄ See I. 258 (Lindelos).

LinwÃ« Tinto See I.269 (TinwÃ« Linto).

LÃ³kÃ« See FoalÃ³kÃ«.

LÃ³'s See I.254 (Gar Lossion). The later form loth does not appear in GL (which has however lothwing 'foamflower'). NFG has âLÃ³'s is a flower and in Eldarissa lossÃ« which is a rose (all after the word 'flower' struck out).

LÃ³sengriol As with LÃ³'s, the later form lothengriol does not appear in GL. Losengriol is translated 'lily of the valley' in GL, which gives the Gnomish words eng 'smooth, level', enga 'plain, vale', engri 'a level', engriol 'vale-like; of the vale'. NFG says 'Eng is a plain or vale and Engriol that which liveth or dwelleth therein', and translates LÃ³sengriol 'flower of the vale or lily of the valley'.

Los âLÃ³riol (changed from Los GLÃ³riol; the Golden Flower of Gondolin). See I.254 (Gar Lossion), and for glÃ³riol 'golden' see I.258 (Laurelin).

Loth, Lothengriol See LÃ³'s, LÃ³sengriol.

Lothlim See LÃ³'s and Gondothlim. The entry in NFG reads: 'Lothlim being for Loslim meaneth folk of the flower, and is that name taken by the Exiles of Gondolin (which city they had called LÃ³'s aforetime).'

Â

Mablung For mab 'hand' see Ermabwed. The second element is lung 'heavy; grave, serious' related words are lungra 'weigh, hang heavy', luntha 'balance, weigh', lunthang 'scales'.

Malkarauki See I.250 (Balrog).

Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va See I.260 and add: a late entry in GL gives the Gnomish name, Bara Dhair Haithin, the Cottage of Lost Play; also daira 'play' (with dairwen 'mirth', etc.), and haim or haithin 'gone, departed, lost' (with haitha 'ago, walk', etc.). Cf. Dairon.

Mathusdor (Aryador, HisilÃ³mÃ«). In GL are given math 'dusk', mathrin 'dusky', mathusgi 'at twilight', mathwen 'evening'. See Umboth-muilin.

Mavwin A noun mavwin 'wish' in GL was struck out, but related words allowed to stand: mav 'like', mavra 'eager after', mavri 'appetite', mavrin 'delightful, desirable', mavros 'desire', maus 'pleasure; pleasant'. Mavwin's name in Qenya, MavoinÃ«, is not in QL, unless it is to be equated with maivoin «great longing».

Meleth A noun meleth «love» is found in GL; see I.262 (Nessa).

Melian, Melinon, Melinir None of these names occur in the glossaries, but probably all are derivatives of the stem mel- «love» see I.262 (Nessa). The later etymology of Melian derived the name from mel- «love» (Melyanna «dear gift»).

Meoita, Miaugion, Miaul «See Tevildo.

Mindon-Gwar For mindon «tower» see I. 260 (Minethlos); and for Gwar see p. 291 and I.257 (Kôr, korin).

Morgoth See p. 67 and Gothmog. For the element mor- see I.261 (Morni«).

Mormagli, Mormakil See I.261 (Morni«) and I.259 (Makar).

Â

Nan Dumgorthin See p. 62. For nan see I.261 (Nandini).

Nantathrin This name does not occur in the Lost Tales, where the Land of Willows is called Tasarinan, but GL gives it (see I.265 (Sirion)) and NFG has an entry: «Dor-tathrin was that Land of Willows of which this and many a tale tells.» GL has tathrin «willow», and QL tasarin of the same meaning.

Nauglafring GL has the following entry: «Nauglafring = Fring na Nauglithon, the Necklace of the Dwarves. Made for Ellu by the Dwarves from the gold of Glorund that Mâ®m the fatherless cursed and that brought ruin on Beren Ermabwed and Damrod his son and was not appeased till it sank with Elwing beloved of Eäçrendel to the bottom of the sea.» For Damrod (Daimord) son of Beren see pp. 139, 259, and for the loss of Elwing and the Nauglafring see pp. 255, 264. This is the only reference to the «appeasing» of Mâ®mâs curse. «Gnomish fring means «carcanet, necklace» (Qenya firinga).

Nâniel Cf. Gnomish nÂn «tear», ninios «lamentation», ninna-âweep see I.262 (Nienna).

Nânin-Udathriol («Unnumbered Tears»). See Nâniel. GL gives tathn «number», tathra- «number, count», udathnarol, udathriol «innumerable». Â- is a «negative prefix with any part of speech». (QL casts no light on Nieriltasinwa, p. 84, apart from the initial element nie «tear», see I.262 (Nienna).)

Noldorissa See Eldarissa.

Nos Galdon, Nos nan Alwen See Duilin, Galdor.

Nost-na-Lothion See Duilin.

Â

Parma Kuluinen The Golden Book, see p. 310. This entry is given in QL under root PARA: parma âskin, bark; parchment; book, writingsâ. This word survived in later Quenya (The Lord of the Rings III. 401). For Kuluinen see Glingol.

Peleg (Father of Tuor). GL has a common noun peleg âaxeâ, verb pelectha- âhewâ (QL pelekko âaxeâ, pelekta- âhewâ). Cf. Tuorâs name Pelecthon in the note cited under Idril.

Â

Ramandur See I.259 (Makar).

Rog GL gives an adjective rÃ'g, rog âdoughty, strongâ. But with the Orcsâ name for Egnor Berenâs father, Rog the Fleet, cf. arog âswift, rushingâ, and raug of the same meaning; Qenya arauka.

RÃ's GL gives yet another meaning of this name: âthe Seaâ (Qenya RÃ'sa).

Rodothlim See Rothwarin (earlier form replaced by Rodothlim).

Rothwarin GL has this name in the forms Rothbarin, Rosbarin: â(literally âcavern-dwellersâ) name of a folk of secret Gnomes and also of the regions about their cavernous homes on the banks of the river.â Gnomish words derived from the root ROTO âhollowâ are rod âtube, stemâ, ross âpipeâ, roth âcave, grotâ, rothrin âhollowâ, rodos âcavernâ QL gives rotsÃ'â âpipeâ, rÃ³ta âtubeâ, ronta, rotwa âhollowâ, rotelÃ'â âcaveâ.

RÃ'mhoth See Glamhoth.

RÃ'sitaurion GL gives a noun rÃ's (rÃ's) âendurance, longsuffering, patienceâ, together with adjective rÃ' âenduring, longsuffering; quiet, gentleâ, and verb rÃ'- âremain, stay; endureâ. For taurion see I.267 (Tavari).

Â

Sarnathrod Gnomish sarn âa stoneâ for athrod âfordâ see Artanor.

Sarqindi (âCannibal-ogresâ). This must derive from the root SRK given in QL, with derivatives sarko âfleshâ, sarqa âfleshyâ, sarkuva âcorporeal, bodilyâ.

Silpion An entry in NFG (p. 215) translates the name as âCherry-moonâ. In QL is a word pio âplum, cherryâ (with piukka âblackberryâ, piosenna âhollyâ, etc.), and also Valpio âthe holy cherry of Valinorâ. GL gives Piosil and Silpios, without translation, as names of the Silver Tree, and also a word piog âberryâ.

Â

Taimonto See I.268 (Telimektar).

Talceleb, Taltelepta (Name of Idril/IrildÃ«, âof the Silver Feetâ.)

The first element is Gnomish tÃ¸l âfoot (of people and animals)â related words are taltha âfoot (of things), base, pedestal, pedimentâ, talrind, taldrin âankleâ, taleg, taloth âpathââanother name for the Way of Escape into Gondolin was Taleg Uthwen (see Bad Uthwen). QL under root TALA âsupportâ gives tala âfootâ, talwi (dual) âthe feetâ, talas âsoleâ, etc. For the second element see I.268 (TelimpÃ«). QL gives the form telepta but without translation.

Tarnin Austa For tarn âgateâ see I.261 (Moritaranon). GL gives aust âsummerâ cf. Aur âthe Sunâ, I.271 (Ãr).

Taruithorn, Taruktarna (Oxford). GL gives tÃ¸r âhornâ and tarog âoxâ (Qenya taruku-), Taruithron older Taruitharn âOxfordâ. Immediately following these words are tarn âgateâ and taru â(1) cross (2) crossingâ. QL has taru âhornâ (see Drambolreg), tarukka âhornedâ, tarukko, tarunko âbullâ, Taruktarna âOxfordâ, and under root TARA tara- âcross, go athwartâ, tarna âcrossing, passageâ.

Tasarinan See Nantathrin.

Taurfuin See I.267 (Tavari) and I.253 (Fui).

Teld Quing Ilon NFG has an entry: â*Cris a Teld Quing Ilon* signifieth Gully of the Rainbow Roof, and is in the Eldar speech *Kiris Iluqingatelda*â a Teld Quing Ilon was struck out and replaced by Ilbranteloth. Another entry reads: â*Ilon* is the skyâ in GL Ilon (= Qenya Ilu) is the name of IlÃ¸vatar (see I.255 (IlwÃ¸«)). Teld does not appear in GL, but related words as telm âroofâ are given (see I.267â8 (Teleri)); and cwing = âbowâ. QL has iluqinga ârainbowâ (see I.256 (Ilweran)) and telda âhaving a roofâ (see I.268 (Telimektar)). For Cris, Kiris see Cris Ilbranteloth.

Tevido, Tifil For the etymology see I.268, to which can be added that the earlier Gnomish form Tifil (later Tiberth) is associated in GL with a noun tÃ¸f âresentment, ill-feeling, bitternessâ.

Vardo Meoita âPrince of Catsâ: for Vardo see I.273 (Varda). QL gives meoi âcatâ.

Bridhon Miaugion âPrince of Catsâ: bridhon âking, princeâ, cf. Bridhil, Gnomish name of Varda (I.273). Nouns miaug, miog âtomcatâ and miauli âshe-catâ (changed to miaulin) are given in GL, where the Prince of Cats is called Tifli Miothon or Miaugion. *Miaul*Â« was the name of *Tevildo*âs cook (p. 28).

Thorndor See I.266 (Sorontur).

Thornhoth See Glamhoth.

Thorn Sir See I.265 (Sirion).

Tifanto This name is clearly to be associated with the Gnomish words (tif-, tifin) given in I.268 (Tinfang).

Tifil See Tevildo.

Tirin See I.258 (Kortirion).

TÃ´n a Gwedrin TÃ´n is a Gnomish word meaning âfire (on a hearth)â, related to tan and other words given under *Tanyasalp*Â« (I.266â7); TÃ´n a Gwedrin âthe Tale-fireâ in *Mar Vanwa Tyali*Â«va. Cf. TÃ´n Sovriel âthe fire lake of Valinorâ (sovriel âpurificationâ, sovri âcleansingâ sÃ´n âpure, cleanâ, soth âbathâ, sÃ´ - âwash, clean, batheâ).

Gwedrin belongs with cwed- (preterite cwenithi) âsay, tellâ, cweth âwordâ, cwent âtale, sayingâ, cwess âsaying, proverbâ, cwedri âtelling (of tales)â, ugwedriol âunspeakable, ineffableâ. In QL under root QETE are qet-(*qent*Â«) âspeak, talkâ, quent âwordâ, *qentel*Â« âsentenceâ, Eldaqet = Eldarissa, etc. Cf. the Appendix to The Silmarillion, entry quen-(quet-).

Tumladin For the first element, Gnomish tÃ´m âvalleyâ, see I.269 (Tombo), and for the second, ladin âlevel, smoothâ see Ladwen na Dhaideloth.

Turambar For the first element see I.260 (Meril-i-Turingi). QL gives amarto, ambar âFateâ, and also (root M^RT^R) mart âa piece of luckâ, marto âfortune, fate, lotâ, mart- âit happensâ (impersonal). GL has mart âfateâ, martion âfated, doomed, feyâ also umrod and umbart âfateâ.

Turumart See Turambar.

Â

Ufedhin Possible connections of this name are Gnomish uf âout of, forth fromâ, or fedhin âbound by agreement, ally, friendâ.

Ulbandi See I.260 (Melko).

Ulmonan The Gnomish name was Ingulma(n) (Gulma = Ulmo), with the prefix in- (ind-, im-) 'house of' (ind 'house', see Idril). Other examples of this formation are Imbelca, Imbelcon 'Hell' (house of Melko), inthorn 'eyrie', Intavros 'forest' (properly 'the forest palace of Tavros').

Umboth-muilin Gnomish umboth, umbath 'nightfall' Umbathor is a name of Garioth (see I.252 (Eruman)). This word is derived from mbap-, related to map seen in math 'dusk': see Mathusdor. The second element is muil 'tarn', Qenya moil 'moil'.

Undolaur See Glorund.

Â

Valar NFG has the following entry: 'Banin [emended from Banion] or Bandrim [emended from Banlim]. Now these dwell, say the Noldoli, in Gwalien [emended from Banien] but they are spoken of ever by Elfrith and the others in their Elfin names as the Valar (or Vali), and that glorious region of their abode is Valinor'. See I.272 (Valar).

SHORT GLOSSARY OF OBSOLETE, ARCHAIC, AND RARE WORDS

Words that have been given in the similar glossary to Part I (such as an âifâ, fain, lief, meed, rede, ruth) are not as a rule repeated here. Some words of current English used in obsolete senses are included.

Â

acquaint old past participle, superseded by acquainted, 287

ardour burning heat, 38, 170 (modern sense 194)

bested beset, 193

bravely splendidly, showily, 75

broidure embroidery, 163. Not recorded, but broid- varied with broud- etc. in Middle English, and broudeure âembroideryâ is found.

burg walled and fortified town, 175

byrnie body-armour, corslet, coat-of-mail, 163

carcanet ornamental collar or necklace, 227â8, 235, 238

carle (probably) serving-man, 85; house-carle 190 chain linear measure (a chainâs length), sixty-six feet, 192 champain level, open country, 295, 298 clue thread, 322

cot small cottage, 95, 141

damasked 224, damascened 173, 227, ornamentally inlaid with designs in gold and silver.

diapered covered with a small pattern, 173

dight arrayed, fitted out, 173

drake dragon, 41, 46, 85â7, etc. (Drake is the original English word, Old English draca, derived from Latin; dragon was from French).

drolleries comic plays or entertainments, 190

enow enough, 241â2

enthralled enslaved, 97, 163, 196, 198

entreat treat, 26, 77, 87, 236 (modern sense 38)

errant wandering, 42

estate situation, 97

ewer pitcher for water, 226 eyot small island, 7 fathom linear measure (six feet), formerly not used only of water, 78 fell in dread fell into dread, 106 force waterfall, 105 (Northern English, from Scandinavian).
fordone overcome, 233
fosses pits, 288
fretted adorned with elaborate carving, 297

glamour enchantment, spell, 314 greaves armour for the lower leg, 163 guestkindliness hospitality, 228. Apparently not recorded; used in I.175.
haply perhaps, 13, 94, 99
hie hasten; hie thee, hasten, 75 high-tide festival, 231 house-carle 190, see carle.
inly inwardly, 315
jacinth blue, 274
kempt combed, 75; unkempt, uncombed, 159 kirtle long coat or tunic, 154 knave male child, boy, 96 (the original sense of the word, long since lost).
lair in the dragonâs lair, 105, the place where the dragon was lying (i.e. happened at that time to be lying).
lambent (of flame) playing lightly on a surface without burning, 297 league about three miles, 171, 189, 201 lealty loyalty, 185
let desisted, 166; allowed, 181; had let fashion, had had fashioned, 174, let seize, had (him) seized, 225, let kill, had (them) killed, 235 like please, 41; good liking, good will, friendly disposition, 169 list wish, 85, 101; like, 236 or ever before ever, 5â6, 38, 80, 110, 233â4, 240
orâ|or eitherâ|or, 226
pale boundary, 269
ports gateways, 299 prate chatter, speak to no purpose, 75

puissance power, 168 repair make one's way, go, 162 runagate deserter, 15, 44 (the same word in origin as renegade, 15, 44, 224, 232) scathe hurt, harm, 99, 233
scatterlings wanderers, stragglers, 182 sconces brackets fastened on a wall, to carry candle or torch, 226 scullion menial kitchen-servant, drudge, 17, 45 shallop 274. See I.275; but here the boat is defined as oarless.
silvern silver, 270 (the original Old English adjective).
slot track of an animal, 38, 96 (= spoor 38).
stead farm, 89 stricken in the Stricken Anvil, struck, beaten, 174, 179
swinge stroke, blow, 194
thews strength, bodily power, 33 tilth cultivated (tilled) land, 4, 88, 101 tithe tenth part, 188, 223, 227 travail hardship, suffering, 77, 82, 239; toil, 168; travailed, toiled, 163; travailing, enduring hardship, 75 trencher large dish or platter, 226 uncouth 85 perhaps has the old meaning 'strange', but elsewhere (13, 75, 115) has the modern sense.

vambrace armour for the fore-arm, 163 weird fate, 85, 111, 155, 239 whin gorse, 287
whortle whortleberry, bilberry; whortlebush 287 withe withy, flexible branch of willow, 229 worm serpent, dragon, 85, etc.
wrack downfall, ruin, 116, 253, 283, 285

SEARCHABLE TERMS

The pagination of this electronic edition does not match the edition from which it was created. To locate a specific passage, please use the search feature of your e-book reader.

Â

This index is made on the same basis as that to Part I, but selected references are given in rather more cases, and the individual Lost Tales are not included. In view of the large number of names that appear in Part II fairly full cross-references are provided to associated names (earlier and later forms, equivalents in different languages, etc.). As in the index to Part I, the more important names occurring in The Silmarillion are not given explanatory definitions; and references sometimes include passages where the person or place is not actually named.

Â

ÂlfhÂ¢m (Old English) âElfhomeâ. 301â2. See Eldaros.

Âlfheah (Old English) Companion of Âlfwine; called âthe fatherlessâ. 315â16, 320, 323, 330, 332â4. (Replaced Gelimer.)

Âlfred of Wessex (language of) 301

Âlfwine (Old English) âElf-friendâ. 278, 300â5, 307â11, 313â23, 325, 327, 329â34. âThe Âfwine storyâ 300, 303, 305, 310â12, 323, 326. See Eldairon, LÂ¢thien (1).

Aelin-uial âMeres of Twilightâ. 217, 249. (Replaced Umboth-muilin, the Pools of Twilight.)

Afros River in Tol EressÂ¢a, joining the Gruir at the bridge of Tavrobel (see 288). 284, 287

Agarwaen âBlood-stainedâ, name given to himself by TÂ¢rin in Nargothrond. 128

Ailios Earlier name of Gilfanon. 69â70, 144â5, 221â2, 228, 242â3, 256, 284, 294

AinulindalÂ¢ 219. See Music of the Ainur.

Ainur Singular Ainu 15, 32, 36, 113, 177, 198; Ainu Melko 15, 18, 33; Ainu of Evil 22. Plural Ainu 202, 264; Ainur 151â2, 165, 174, 197, 202, 204, 218â19. See Gar Ainion, Music of the Ainur, Valar.

Airin Wife of Brodda; called Faiglindra, Firilanda, of the long hairâ (90, 93). 89â91, 93, 126â8. Later form Aerin 126â7

AlalminÃ³rÃ« âLand of Elmsâ, region of England (Warwickshire) and of Tol EressÃ«a. 292, 313, 324, 327

Albion Used once of Luthany (England). 304

Alley of Roses Street in Gondolin. 183

AlqarÃ³mÃ« âSwanwingâ, Tuorâs ship. 254, 265. See EÃ³rrÃ³mÃ«, Swanwing.

Aman 64, 266

Ambarkanta âShape of the Worldâ (cosmological work). 325

Amillo Youngest of the great Valar, called also Ãmar. 279

Amnon âthe prophetâ. 184. See I. 172.

Amon Darthir A peak in the range of Ered Wethrin. 126

Amon Ethir âHill of Spiesâ, east of Nargothrond. 128, 135. See Hill of Spies.

Amon Gwareth âHill of Watchâ on which Gondolin was built. 158â60, 163, 166, 168, 171, 175â6, 178, 180, 189, 196, 207, 212. See Hill of Watch.

Amon Obel Hill in the Forest of Brethil. 135

Amras Son of FÃ«anor. 251. (Replaced DÃriel.)

Amrod Son of FÃ«anor. 251. (Replaced Damrod.)

Anach Pass leading down from Taur-nu-Fuin. 211

Ancient Mariner See Man of the Sea.

Anfauglith 57, 62. See Dor-nu-Faугlith.

Angainu The great chain in which Melko was bound. 19, 46; Angaino 68

Angali Angles. 306

Angamandi âHells of Ironâ. 13â14, 18, 21, 23, 29, 31â2, 34, 36, 43, 51, 56â8, 62, 68, 87, 94, 138, 223, 264, 280. See Angband, Hells of Iron.

Angband 35, 43â5, 51, 57, 61â2, 65â6, 68, 72, 77, 79, 124, 140, 142, 206, 211, 213, 238, 241; Siege of Angband 209. See Angamandi, Hells of Iron.

Angeln 294

Angles 306. See Angali.

Anglo-Saxon(s) 266, 305, 309, 323

Angol âIroncliffsâ, Gnomish name of Eriol and of his homeland.

290â2, 294

Angolcynn (Old English) The English people. 291; Angelcynn 300.

See Engle, English.

Angorodin The Iron Mountains. 77, 140. See Iron Mountains.

Angrist Curufinâs knife, made by Telchar of Nogrod. 58

Annael Grey-elf of Mithrim, fosterfather of Tuor. 205

Annals of Valinor 300

Arch of Heaven, the Arch See Heavenly Arch.

Arch of InwÄ« Western entry to the Place of the Well in Gondolin. 182

Ard-galen 62

Aredhel Sister of Turgon, mother of Maeglin. 212. (Replaced Isfin.)

Arlisgion âPlace of Reedsâ above the mouths of Sirion. 153, 202, 217. See Lisgardh.

Arminas Noldorin Elf who with Gelmir guided Tuor through the Gate of the Noldor and afterwards brought the warning of Ulmo to Nargothrond, 123, 125, 204

Aros The river forded at Sarnathrod. 236â8, 251; identified with the river flowing past the caves of the Rodothlim, 236 (see 244 note 15).

Artanor âThe Land Beyondâ, region afterwards named Doriath. 9, 13, 21, 30, 35, 37, 41, 43, 47, 49, 52, 54, 56, 58â9, 61â5, 120â2, 127â9, 141â2, 223, 230â4, 236, 240, 243, 246, 248â51, 254, 276. See especially 61, and see Doriath, Land(s) Beyond. References to the protection of Artanor by the magic of the Queen: 9, 35â6, 43, 47â8, 63, 76, 122, 132, 137, 230â2, 249â50

Arval An early name of EÄ¶l. 220

Arvalin 286

Aryador âLand of Shadowâ, name of HisilÃ³mÃ« among Men. 15, 42, 44, 50â1, 61, 70, 202, 249. See Dor LÃ³min, HisilÃ³mÃ«, Hithlum, Land of Shadow(s), Mathusdor.

Asgon Earlier name of (Lake) Mithrim. 70, 88, 202, 204, 263. See Mithrim.

Atlantic Ocean 261

AulÃ« 19, 46, 174, 218, 269, 272

Auredhir Son of Dior. 240â1, 251

Ausir (1) âThe Wealthyâ, name of Dior. 240, 244, 251. (2) A boy of Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va. 5, 7â8, 40â2, 50, 59, 311

Avari 64

Avon, River 295â6

Â

Bablon Gnomish form of Babylon. 196, 203, 214; Babylon 203, 214

Bad Uthwen The Way of Escape into the plain of Gondolin. 189, 203; earlier Bad Uswen, Bad Usbran 203. See Way of Escape.

Balar, Isle of 209

Balcmeg Orc slain by Tuor in Gondolin. 181

Balrog(s) 15, 34, 44, 67, 85, 156, 169â70, 174â6, 178â84, 186, 189, 193â4, 212â13, 216. Numbers of, 170, 179, 184, 213; described, 169, 181, 194, 212â13. See Malkarauki.

Bansil âFair-gleamâ, the Tree of Gondolin with silver blossom. 160, 184, 186, 203, 207, 214, 216; later form Banthil 203. See Belthil.

Barad-dÃ»r 67

Baragund Father of Morwen. 139

Barahir Father of Beren. 43, 51. (Replaced Egnor.)

Battle of Unnumbered Tears Called also the Battle of Tears, of Uncounted Tears, of Lamentation, and the great battle. 9â10, 17, 43â5, 65â6, 70, 73, 77, 83â4, 88, 91, 101, 120â1, 140, 142, 157, 198, 200, 208â9, 216, 218. See Nieriltasinwa, NÃnin-Udathriol.

Bay of FaÃ«ry See FaÃ«ry.

Bee of Azure Sirius. 282; Blue Bee 281. See Nielluin.

Belaurin Gnomish form of PalÃ«rien. 281, 328; Belawryn 310

Belcha Gnomish name of Melko. Belcha Morgoth 44, 67

Beleg 21, 47, 59, 62, 73, 76â83, 102, 118, 121â4, 141â2. Called âwood-rangerâ, âhunterâ, âhuntsmanâ 73, 76â7, 81, 123; a Noldo 78, 122â3; later surname CÃ«thalion âStrongbowâ 59, 62, 124

Belegost City of the Indrafang Dwarves. 230â1, 235, 244â8; Ost Belegost 244

Beleriand 64, 128, 205, 217, 245, 324; Drowning of Beleriand 251, 324

Belerion Harbour in the west of Britain. 313â15, 317, 322, 324, 330â3

Belthil The Tree of Gondolin with silver flowers, made by Turgon. 207. See Bansil.

Belthronding The bow of Beleg. 123
Beorn Uncle of Ottor Wæfre (Eriol). 290â1, 294. See *Hasen of Isen*Â³*ra*.
Beowulf 298, 323; J. R. R. Tolkien, On Translating Beowulf, 331
Beren 11â19, 21â31, 33â41, 43â5, 48â9, 52â63, 65â8, 71â3, 116, 123â4, 137, 139â40, 144â5, 215, 223, 231, 233â43, 246, 248â51, 259, 330. Called the One-handed, of the One Hand (see *Ermabwed, Elmavoit*Â«); Beren of the Hills 49; hunter of the Noldoli, of the woods 13, 237. For Beren as Man or Elf see 52, 116, 139, 215, 248
Bethos Chief of the Woodmen. 101â2, 106, 111, 130, 142; Bethosâ wife (a Noldo) 101, 130
Bidding of the Minstrel, The (poem) 269â71; associated outline 261â2, 265
Bior Man of the Ythlings who accompanied Ælfwine. 319, 321â2, 331â2, 334 Bitter Hills See Iron Mountains.
Blackword Name of TÂ⁹rin among the Rodothlim (later Nargothrond). 84, 128. See Mormagli, Mormakil, Mormegil.
Blessed Realm(s) 34, 82, 266
Blue Bee See Bee of Azure.
bo-Dhuilin, bo-Dhrauthodavros, bo-Rimion âson ofâ Duilin, etc.; see the names. (bo- replaced go-).
Bodruith Lord of Belegost. 230â1, 234â5, 246â7
Brandir 130â4. (Replaced Tamar.)
Brethil, Forest of 125, 130, 132, 135, 141
Britain 294, 301, 305, 309
Brithonin Invaders of Tol EressÂ«a. 294
Brittany 285
Brodna Lord of men in HisilÂ³mÂ«. 89â90, 93, 126â8
Bronweg Gnomish form of *Voronw*Â«. 144â5, 148â9, 156â7, 160, 197â8, 228, 256. See *Voronw*Â«.
Brook of Glass Near Tavrobel. 287
Brown Elves See Green Elves.
Buckland 328

Â

Cabed-en-Aras âThe Deerâs Leapâ, ravine in the Teiglin. 134â5
*Caergw*Â«*r, Caer Gw*Â«r Name of Kortirion in Welsh. 292, 307

Carcaras See Karkaras.

Carcharoth 58â9, 68; âthe Red Mawâ 68

Carpenter, Humphrey 69; J. R. R. Tolkien, A Biography, 146, 267, 271, 273, 277, 300

Celebros Stream in Brethil, tributary of the Teiglin. 130, 132â3, 135, 140

Celegorm Son of FÃ«anor. 54, 56â7, 241, 250

Charlemagne 330

Children (of the Cottage of Lost Play) 284

Children of the Gods 8 (daughter of the Gods 10, 43); Children of the Valar 216

Cirith Ninniach âRainbow Cleftâ. 204. See Cris Ilbranteloth, Glorfalc, Teld Quing Ilon.

Cirith Thoronath âEaglesâ Cleftâ. 213. See Cristhorn.

City of Present Sorrow, The (poem) 295â8

City of Seven Names Gondolin. 158

City of Stone (Gondobar), Gondolin. 77, 157â8, 161. City of the Dwellers in Stone (Gondothlimbar), Gondolin. 158

Cleft of Eagles In the Encircling Mountains about Gondolin. 168, 174, 189, 201; Eaglesâ Cleft 191, 196, 210, 213â14. See Cristhorn.

Constantinople 330. See MikligarÃ°r.

CÃ³pas Alqalunten âHaven of the Swanshipsâ. 82. See KÃ³pas, Swanhaven.

Cottage of Lost Play (not including references to the Tale) 7, 258, 292, 302, 326â7. See Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va.

Cranthor Son of FÃ«anor (later Cranthir). 241â2, 250

Cris Ilbranteloth âGully of the Rainbow Roofâ, by which Tuor came to the Sea (later Cirith Ninniach). 150, 202; Ilbranteloth 263. See Glorfalc, Golden Cleft, Teld Quing Ilon.

Cristhorn, Cris Thorn âEaglesâ Cleftâ, in the Encircling Mountains about Gondolin. 174, 189, 191â3, 201, 203, 214, 216, 267. See Cirith Thoronath, Cleft of Eagles.

Crossings of Teiglin 127, 130, 132

Cuilwarthon See IÃ©Cuilwarthon.

CÃ©m an-Idrisaith âThe Mound of Avariceâ in Artanor. 223, 251

Curufin Son of FÃ«anor; called âthe Craftyâ. 54, 56â8, 124, 241â2, 250

CÃ©thalion See Beleg.

Cwān Wife of Ottor Wæfre (Eriol). 290â1

Å

Dagor Bragollach âThe Battle of Sudden Flameâ. 209

Daimord Son of Beren and Tinā^ovial (= "Dior)." 139, 259. See Damrod (1)

Dairon Minstrel of Artanor, brother of Tinā^oviel. 10â13, 17â21, 30, 36â7, 43, 46â7, 49â50, 52, 59, 62, 65. Later from Daeron 52. See Kapalen, Tifanto.

Damrod (1) Son of Beren and Tinā^oviel (= "Dior)." 72, 139. (2) Damrod the Gnome, apparently a name of Berenâs father (= "Egnor)." 186, 139â40. (3) Son of FÅ«anor (later Amrod). 241â2, 251

Danes See East Danes; Dani 306

Danigwiel A form of the Gnomish name of Taniquetil. 202

Dark Elves 64, 141

Denmark 323; Danish peninsula 294

Dā©or (1) Father of Ålfwine. 313â14, 323, 330, 334. (2) The Old English poem Dā©or, and Dā©or the Minstrel. 323

Dhrauthodavros In bo-Dhrauthodavros (changed from go-Dhrauthodauros) âson of the weary forestâ, name given to himself by TÅ^orin. 89. See RÅ^ositaurlon.

Dhuilin = Duilin (1) in prefixed (patronymic) forms.

Dimbar 214

Dimrost The falls of Celebros in Brethil. 130

Dinithel (?Durithel) Son of FÅ«anor. 241, 245, 251. (Replaced ? Mailweg 241, 244â5). See DÅriel.

Dior Son of Beren and Tinā^oviel, father of Elwing; called âthe Fairâ. 139, 214â15, 240â1, 244, 246, 249, 251. See Ausir (1), Daimor, Damrod (1).

DÅriel Son of FÅ«anor. 251. (Replaced Dinithel/Durithel; later Amras.)

Door of Night 255, 259, 265, 268, 273, 325; dragon-headed door(s) 272â5; mouth of night 276

Dor Athro âThe Land Beyondâ. 41, 61. See Artanor, Doriath, Land(s) Beyond.

Dor Daedeloith The land of Morgoth. 328

Doriath 41, 52â3, 57â8, 61, 64, 122, 126â8, 130, 137, 247, 250â1; Doriath beyond Sirion (Nivrim) 249. See Artanor, Dor

Athro, Land(s) Beyond.

Dorlas Companion of Turambar in the attack on Glaurung. 132â4

Dor LÃ³min, Dor-lÃ³min 11, 43, 50â2, 61, 65â6, 71â2, 87, 120, 122, 126, 128, 149, 152â4, 202, 204, 215, 219, 250, 256, 279. See Aryador, HisilÃ³mÃ«, Hithlum, Land of Shadow(s), Mathusdor.

Dor-na-Dhaideloth (Battle of) 287; for the name see 328. See Lodwen-na-Dhaideloth, Heath of the Sky-roof.

Dor-nu-Fauglith 62. See Anfauglith.

Dorthonion âLand of Pinesâ. 62. See Forest of Night, Taurfuin, Taur-nu-Fuin.

Dragons Selected references (including drakes, worms):

concerning dragons 85, 96â7, 125, 142â3; the âdragonsâ that came against Gondolin (called also monsters, serpents, snakes) 169â70, 172, 174, 176, 178â89, 195, 210, 213. See FoalÃ³kÃ«, Glorund.

Dramborleg The axe of Tuor. 164, 181, 203, 213; rejected form Drambor 203

Draugluin 55â8, 68

Dry River The entrance to Gondolin. 207

Duilin (1) Father of Flinding. 79, 119; with patronymic prefix go- > bo-Dhuilin âson of Duilinâ 78, 82, 119. (2) Lord of the people of the Swallow in Gondolin. 173, 175, 178, 203; rejected form Duliglin 203

Dwarves (including Dwarf-folk) 68, 136, 223â30, 232, 234â9, 241, 243, 245â51, 283, 328; adjective dwarven 227, dwarfen 238. See especially 223â4, 247â8, and see Indrafangs, Nauglath, Nauglafring.

Â

Ãadgifu (Old English) (1) Ãlfwineâs wife, Elf of Tol EressÃ«a. 290. See Naimi. (2) DÃ©orâs wife, mother of Ãlfwine. 313â14, 323, 330â1.

Eagles 58, 193, 211; King of Eagles, see Ramandur, Sorontur, Thorndor; People of the Eagles, see Thornhoth; Eaglesâ Cleft, see Cleft of Eagles; Eagle-stream, see Thorn Sir; the Eagle as emblem, 193, 267

ÃalÃ« Ãarendel engla beorhtast (poem) 266â9, 271, 277

EÃ«rÃ«mÃ« âEaglepinionâ, EÃ«rendelâs first ship. 253â4, 261, 265, 267. Earum 260â1, 276, Earam 276. See Earnhama, EÃ« ✠rrÃjmÃ«.

EÃrendel 130, 144â5, 149, 165, 167, 169â71, 174, 177â8, 185, 187â93, 196, 199â201, 213, 215â17, 219, 221, 242, 252â70, 272, 274, 276, 278, 281, 286, 290, 302, 304, 306â10; unnamed, in Ulmoâs words to Tuor, 155, 205. See especially 266â7. Lay of EÃrendel 270. Later form EÃrendil 212, 265â6; Earendl 267

EÃrendilyon âSon of EÃrendelâ, mariner, 264

Earnhama (Old English) âEagle-dressâ, see 276

EÃrrÃjmÃ« âSea-wingâ, Tuorâs ship. 265. See AlqarÃjmÃ«, EÃrÃjmÃ«.

East Danes 305; East-Denum (Old English, dative case) 305

Easterling Men, Easterlings 120, 126, 204. See Incomers.

Ecthelion (1) Lord of the people of the Fountain in Gondolin; called Ecthelion of the Fountain, Lord of the Fountain(s). 173, 175, 180â4, 191, 200, 211â13, 215â16. (2) Name of two Stewards of Gondor. 212

Edain 266

Edda (Old Norse) 125

Egalmoth (1) Lord of the people of the Heavenly Arch in Gondolin. 173, 175, 183, 192, 212, 215, 258, 278â9. (2) Steward of Gondor. 211

Eglamar = Eldamar. 262, 265, 272

Eglavain Elfinesse (?). 320, 325

Egnor Father of Beren; called âthe foresterâ, âthe huntsman of the Elves, of the Gnomesâ, âElf of the greenwoodâ. 11, 15, 22â3, 28, 43â5, 49, 51â2, 61, 65â6, 71â2, 116, 139â40, 242, 248. Egnor bo-Rimion (> go-Rimion) âson of Rimionâ 22, 51. See Rog (1).

Eithel Ivrin 123; Ivrin 124

Elbenil Littleheart. 202. (Replaced by Elwenil.)

Eldairon Elvish name of Ãlfwine: Eldairon of LÃºthien, replacing LÃºthien of Luthany. 313

EldaliÃ« 9, 42â3, 115, 130, 136, 165, 167, 180, 199, 215, 219, 224, 241, 265

Eldamar âElfhomeâ. 261â2, 272, 287. See Eglamar.

Eldar Selected references: used of all Elves including Dark Elves 9, 64, 82; in reference to Noldoli 95, 149; distinct from Noldoli 153, 165, 178, 215, 218, 289. References to the language of the Eldar (as opposed to Gnomish) 8, 70, 85,

- 148â9, 169, 192, 199, 215â16 (see Eldarissa, Elfin); Eldar as adjective referring to the language 148. See Elves.
- Eldarissa* The language of the Eldar, as distinct from Noldorissa. 148â9, 280
- Eldaros* = ÃlfhÃçm, Elfhhome. 301. Eldos 302
- Elder Days* 324
- ElenwÃ*« Wife of Turgon. 209
- Elf-friend* 141 (of Årin), 313 (of DÃ©or Ålfwineâs father).
- Elfin* References only to use as name of the language of the âEldarâ (as distinct from Gnomish). 42, 49, 149, 202, 267; probably used in general sense 304. See Eldar, Eldarissa.
- Elfinesse* 21, 38, 43, 47, 59, 130, 240, 313, 321, 323, 325; children of Elfinesse 159, 326, daughter of Elfinesse 164, 215
- Elf-march* The expedition of the Elves of KÃ´r for the rescue of the Gnomes in the Great Lands. 144, 221, 252; March of the Elves 253, 257â8, 278â80, 303â4, 307â8, March of the Inwir and Teleri 255, 278, March of Liberation 279. See Faring Forth.
- Elfriniel* Littleheart. 148, 201, 214â16. (Replaced by Elfrith.)
- Elfriniol* 50, 201. (Replaced by Ilfiniol.) See Ilfiniol, Ilfrin.
- Elfrith* Littleheart. 148, 201â2, 216. (Replaced Elfriniel.) See Ilfrith.
- Ellon* A (Gnomish) name of Tinwelint. 69, 116. See Tintoâellon, Tinthellon.
- Ellu* (1) Name of Tinwelint in Eldarissa. 49â50, 69. (2) Lord of the Solosimpi in Tinwelintâs place (later OlwÃç). 50
- ElmavoitÃ*« âOne-handedâ, name of Beren âin the language of the Lonely Isle.â 34. See Ermabwed.
- Elmir* One of the two first Men (with Ermon). 305
- Eltas* Teller of the Tale of Turambar. 69â70, 112, 116, 118â19, 135â7, 144â5, 242â3; see especially 119.
- Elu Thingol* 50
- Elvenfolk* 286, 297. Elvenland 272
- Elves* Selected references (see also Eldar, Fairies). Used to include Gnomes 22, 26, 35, 38, etc.; distinct from Gnomes 8, 45, 48â9, 216â17. Fate of the Elves 60, 250; stature of Elves and Men 73, 80, 142, 159, 198, 220, 281, 283, 326â7; references to âfadingâ 240, 242, 250, 281, 283, 285â9, 293â4, 301, 304, 306, 312â14, 323, 326â7; union with mortals, see Men; feud with the Dwarves 230; tongues of 4, 148, 163; written characters 163; and Old English 301â2, 304, 309.

Wild Elves 77, 95, 113, 128, 243. See Brown, Dark, Green, Grey-, Island-, Lost, Elves; for Hidden, Secret, Wood(land) Elves see Woodland Elves.

ElwÃ« Singollo Thingol. 50

Elwenil Littleheart. 202. (Replaced Elbenil.)

Elwenildo Littleheart. 201. (Replaced by Ilverin.)

Elwing 139, 214â15, 240â2, 251â6, 258â61, 264â5, 276, 279, 303, 307â8

Eneadur The island of the Ythlings. 319â20, 322, 325

Eneathrim The Ythlings. 331, 334. See Shipmen of the West.

Enchanted Isles 324â5

Encircling Mountains, Encircling Hills The mountains encircling the plain of Gondolin. 163, 166, 169â71, 175â6, 189, 193, 201, 207, 211, 213â14. See especially 207, and see Heborodin.

England 285, 291, 293â4, 301, 303â4, 308â9, 311â12, 314, 316, 319, 323, 327, 330â1, 333â4; Englaland (Old English) 291, 301â2. See Luthany, LÃ«thien (3), Leithian.

Engle (Old English) The English people. 290â1. See Angolcynn, English.

English (both people and language) 291â3, 301â2, 304â5, 308â9, 313, 320, 322â3, 327â8; Englisc 292. See Anglo-Saxon(s), Old English.

Eoh Father of Ottor Wæfre (Eriol). 290â1, 294. (Replaced by DÃ©or (1).)

EÃ«l Father of Meglin (Maeglin). 165, 168, 199, 220, 248

Ephel Brandir 135

Ered Gorgoroth The Mountains of Terror. 63

Ered Wethrin The Mountains of Shadow. 62, 132, 217

Erenol âIron Cliffsâ, âCoast of Ironâ, Lionesse. 334. (Replaced by Evadrien.)

Eriol 3â9, 21, 40â2, 49, 145, 148â9, 209, 258, 264, 278â9, 283â4, 286â7, 289â95, 300â1, 303, 311, 323, 326, 329â30. âThe Eriol storyâ 293â4, 300, 303, 310â11, 323, 329â30.

Song of Eriol (poem) 298â300. See Melinon.

Ermabwed âOne-handedâ, (Gnomish) name of Beren. 34, 36, 71â2, 116, 137, 144â5, 242. See ElmavoitÃ«.

Ermon One of the two first Men (with Elmir). 305

Eruman 68 (the giant of Eruman). ErumÃ«ni 264; Battle of ErumÃ«ni 285â6

Esgalduin 63
Europe 261
Euti Jutes. 306
Evadrien âCoast of Ironâ, Lionesse. 313, 334. (Replaced Erenol.)
Evening Star 267â8
Evrarin The nurse of Elwing. 241
Exeter Book (of Old English poetry) 323
Exeter College, Oxford 147, 199, 273, 277; 329

Â

Faelivrin Name given to Finduilas, daughter of Orodreth of Nargothrond. 124. See Failivrin, Finduilas.
FaÃ«ry, FaÃ«rie 321; Bay of FaÃ«ry 260, 313, 316, 324â5; Lamp of FaÃ«ry (the Silmaril) 238; shores of FaÃ«ry 271â2; The Shores of FaÃ«ry (poem) 271â3, prose preface 262, 265
Fafnir The dragon slain by Sigurd. 125
Faiglindra See Airin.
Failivrin Daughter of Galweg of the Rodothlim. 82â7, 102, 124â5, 138. See Faelivrin.
Fairies Synonymous with Elves. 10, 23â4, 26, 28, 31, 35, 41, 113, 223, 240, 242, 249, 252, 257, 261, 264, 270, 274, and very frequently in Chapter VI; distinguished from Gnomes 113
Fairyland 316
Falasquil Tuorâs dwelling in a cove of the sea-coast. 152, 202, 204â5, 217, 253â6, 260â1, 263â4, 276
FalmarÃ«ni Spirits of the sea-foam. 276
Fangluin âBluebeardâ, Dwarf of Nogrod. 229â30
Faring Forth (1) The March of the Elves of KÃ«r. 302â4, 307â8.
 (2) The expedition from Tol EressÃ«a. 255, 276, 283â7, 289, 293â4, 301, 303, 305, 307â8
Faskalan, Faskala-nÃ«men âBath of the Setting Sunâ. 138. See Fauri, FÃ«sÃ«lmiir, TanyasalpÃ«.
Fauri Earlier name of FÃ«sÃ«lmiir. 138
Fay(s) 10, 13, 29, 32, 43, 54, 64, 71, 76â7, 96, 233, 263, 274
FÃ«anor 13, 129, 137, 204, 216, 228, 240â1, 259, 321; Lamp of FÃ«anor (the Silmaril) 238. See Sons of FÃ«anor.
FÃ«anorians 246, 250â1, 265
Felagund 53â6, 123â4, 126; âLord of Cavesâ 123. See Finrod.
Fellowship of the Ring, The 214, 327. See also Lord of the Rings.

Fell Winter, The 126, 205, 208

Finarfin 123

Finduilas 124â5; Mound of Finduilas 127, 130. See Faelivrin, Haudh-en-Elleth.

Fingolma Name of FinwÃ« NÃ³lemÃ«. 220

Fingon 216

Finrod 246; Finrod Felagund 123. See Felagund.

FinwÃ« NÃ³lemÃ« 200, 220; NÃ³lemÃ« 208. See Fingolma.

FionwÃ«, FionwÃ«-Ãrion Son of ManwÃ« and Varda. 116, 281â3

Fiord of the Mermaid 254, 256, 263

Firilanda See Airin.

First Age 66, 208â9

Flinging Gnome of the Rodothlim, companion of TÃºrin (later Gwindor of Nargothrond). 62, 78â82, 84â5, 116, 118â19, 123â4, 141â2. See Duilin (1), Gwindor.

Flower of the Plain Gondolin. 158, 184. See Lothengriol.

Fluithuin An ogress, mother of Gothmog son of Melko. 216. See Ulbandi.

FoalÃ³kÃ« The dragon Glorund. 70, 91, 94â9, 103, 105â6, 108, 129, 131, 138; lÃ³kÃ« 102. See Fuithlug.

Foamriders âElves of the Sea-margeâ. 314

Forest of Night Taurfuin, the great pine-forest on the Mountains of Night (afterwards Dorthonion, Taur-nu-Fuin). 21, 47, 62, 78. See Taurfuin.

Forodwaith The Men of the North (Vikings). 313â14, 317â18, 323, 330, 334. (Replaced Forwaith.) See Gwasgonin, Men of the North, Men of the Sea, Winged Helms.

Forwaith Earlier form for Forodwaith. 334

FÃ³sâAlmir The Bath of Flame. 115, 138. (Replaced Fauri.) See Faskalan, TanyasalpÃ«.

Fountains of the South In Gondolin. 186. The kingâs fountain in Gondolin: see Square of the Palace.

Fountain, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim (Fountain of the South 181). 173, 180â2, 215. See Ecthelion.

Franks 330

Frisians 306. See Firisandi.

Fui Death-goddess (Nienna). 115

Fuithlug Gnomish form for FoalÃ³kÃ«. 70, 118; earlier forms Fothlug, Fothlog 118

Â

Galdor Lord of the people of the Tree in Gondolin; called Galdor of the Tree. 173â6, 181â2, 185, 189, 191â3, 215â16, 258, 278â9. See Nos Galdon.

Galweg Gnome of the Rodothlim, father of Failivrin. 82, 84â5, 114, 124

Gamgee, Sam 333

Gamil Zirak Dwarf smith, master of Telchar of Nogrod. 129

Gar Ainion âThe Place of the Godsâ in Gondolin. 164, 186, 199, 202, 218; rejected form Gar Ainon 202. See Place of the Gods.

Gar Furion Earlier form for Gar Thurion. 202

Garsecg (Old English) The Great Sea. 312â13, 315â17, 326, 329; Garsedge 329, 332

Gar Thurion âThe Secret Placeâ, one of the Seven Names of Gondolin. 158, 202. (Replaced Gar Furion.)

Gate of the Noldor 123, 204

Gates of Summer Great festival in Gondolin. 172, 201, 211. See Tarnin Austa.

Gelimer Earlier name for Ãlfheah. 332, 334. (Replaced Helgor.)

Gelion 249

Gelmir See Arminas. 123, 125, 204

Gereth Gnome who aided the flight of Elwing from Artanor. 241

Gil = Ingil. 281â2, 328

Gilfanon of Tavrobel (not including references to his Tale) 69, 145, 281, 283â4, 286, 288â9, 292, 294, 326. (Replaced Ailios.)

Gilim A Giant (âWinterâ?) 19, 46, 67â8

Gimli A Gnome, captive in the castle of Tevildo. 29, 55, 214

Glamhoth âFolk of dreadful hateâ, Gnomish name for Ores. 160, 219

Glaurung 68, 125â6, 129, 131â2, 134â5, 143, 213. See Glorund.

Glend The sword of the giant Nan. 67

Glingol âSinging-goldâ, the Tree of Gondolin with golden blossom. 160, 184â6, 207, 216. Later form Glingal (Tree of Gondolin made of gold by Turgon) 207

Gloomweaver The Great Spider. 160. See *Wiril*Ã³mÃ«Ungweliant(Ã«).

Glorfalc âGolden Cleftâ, by which Tuor came to the Sea. 150, 202. See Cris Ilbranteloth, Golden Cleft, Teld Quing Ilon.

Glorfindel Lord of the people of the Golden Flower in Gondolin; called Glorfindel of the golden hair, golden Glorfindel, Goldtress (216). 173, 175, 182â3, 186, 192â4, 196, 211â12, 216, 243, 260

Glorund The Dragon, precursor of Glaurung. References include passages where he is called the drake, etc; see also FoalÃ³kÃ«. 19, 41, 46, 68, 84â8, 94â8, 103â16, 118, 123, 125â6, 128â37, 140â4, 221â3, 229â31, 235â6, 238â9, 241, 246; Glorunt 84. See Laurundo, UndolaurÃ«.

Gnomes Selected references (including Noldoli). Slaves of Melko 9â11, 31, 42â3, 65, 77â8, 154, 156â7, 159, 161, 163, 166, 170, 205â6, 219, 279; free Noldoli 44, 65, 77, 82, 248; in Artanor 9, 43, 65, 122, 254, 276; in Dor LÃ³min 15, 43, 52, 65, 149, 204; among the Dwarves 224, 245; confusion with Ores 159; tongue of 148â9, 158, 198, 216â17; art of 224; lanterns of 78, 80â1, 123, 153; steel, chainmail of 83, 85, 164; miners 168; release of, and return into the West 161â2, 278, 280, 285

Goblins Frequently used as alternative term to Orcs (cf. Melkoâs goblins, the Orcs of the hills 157, but sometimes apparently distinguished, 31, 230). 14, 31, 35, 67, 76â80, 154, 156â7, 159, 176â7, 179â82, 219, 230, 247, 279. See Orcs.

go-Dhuilin, go-Dhrauthodauros, go-Rimion âson ofâ Duilin, etc.; see the names. (go-replaced by bo-).

Gods See Valar.

Golden Book, The 283, 285, 287, 291, 293, 310. See Parma Kuluinen.

Golden Cleft 150, 153, 219. See Glorfalc.

Golden Flower, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim, ruled by Glorfindel. 173, 182, 186, 195, 211, 216. See LosÃ³riol.

Golosbrindi Earlier name of Hirilorn. 51

Gondobar âCity of Stoneâ, one of the Seven Names of Gondolin. 158, 172; in another application 275â6. See City of Stone.

Gondolin âStone of Songâ. 43â4, 65, 70, 77, 119â20, 130, 158â64, 166, 168â72, 175, 178, 184â6, 188â91, 193, 195â9, 201, 203â16, 218, 220, 240â2, 248, 251, 253, 255, 257â8, 260, 266, 276, 289; the Trees of Gondolin 160, 171, 184â5, 207â8, 215â16 (see Bansil, Glingol); the birds that flew from Gondolin to KÃ´r 253, 255, 257, 260, 263, 278; ruins of

Gondolin 215â16, 253, 255, 258, 264; time of the founding of Gondolin 120, 208

Gondolindrim The people of Gondolin. 209

Gondor, Stewards of 211â12

Gondothlim âDwellers in Stoneâ, the people of Gondolin. 155â66, 168, 170â4, 176, 179â81, 184â5, 187, 190, 193, 196, 198â200, 206, 208, 211, 213â16, 267; speech of, secret tongue of 158, 164â5, 198â9, 267; stature of 159, 198

Gondothlimbar âCity of the Dwellers in Stoneâ, one of the Seven Names of Gondolin. 158

Gong of Littleheart 6â7, 41, 254, 256, 263; the Gong-warden 144â5, 149, 201

Gongs Evil beings, obscurely related to Orcs. 136â7, 283, 288, 328

Gon Indor Name of Eärendel as great-grandson of Indor. 217. See Indor, Indorildo.

Gorgumoth The hound of Mandos. 278

Gorlim the Unhappy 52

Gothmog (1) âStrife-and-hatredâ, lord of Balrogs, son of Melko and captain of his hosts. 67, 176, 179, 183â4, 212â13, 215â16. See Kosmoko. (2) Lieutenant of Minas Morgul. 216

Great End 60, 170, 281â3, 285. See Great Wrack.

Great Folk of the West Name of the Gods among the Ilkorins. 142

Great Haywood Village in Staffordshire (Tavrobel). 146, 290, 292â3, 328; (Old English) HÄ|gwudu 290, 292, 328

Great Journey (of the Elves from the Waters of Awakening) 64, 307

Great Lands The lands east of the Great Sea. 4â6, 60, 64â5, 68, 140â1, 206, 208, 249â50, 255, 257â8, 264, 279â81, 283, 285, 289, 292â4, 299â300, 302â3, 306â8, 317, 326â7. See Lands Without, Outer Land(s).

Great Market, The In Gondolin. 182

Great Plains 61

Great Sea (not including many references to the Sea, the Ocean) 151, 155, 162, 196, 312, 315, 324. See Garsecg, Western Sea(s).

Great Wrack 116, 282; Wrack of Things 283; Wrack of the Gods 285. See Great End.

Green Elves 234, 248â9; the brown Elves and the green 237, 240, 242, 248; (Elves) âclad in green and brownâ 234, 248. See Laiquendi.

Greenland 261

Grey-elves of Doriath 64; of Beleriand 64, 128; of Hithlum 204; of Mithrim 205

Grithnir The elder of TÃ°rinÃ°s guardians on the journey to Doriath. 127. See Gumlin.

Gruir River in Tol EressÃ°a, joining the Afros at the bridge of Tavrobel (see 288). 284, 287

Guarded Plain of Nargothrond See Talath Dirnen.

Guilwarthon See IÃ°Guilwarthon.

GuiÃ°lin Invaders of Tol EressÃ°a. 294

Gully of the Rainbow Roof See Cris Ilbranteloth, Teld Quing Ilon.

Gumlin The elder of TÃ°rinÃ°s guardians on the journey to Artanor. 74, 76, 92Ã°3, 127. See Grithnir.

Gumniow Apparently an alternative name for TevildoÃ°s doorkeeper (see Umuiyan). 24

Gurtholfin âWand of Deathâ, TÃ°rinÃ°s sword (later Gurthang). 83, 85, 90, 99, 107Ã°8, 112, 119; earlier form Gortholfin 119

Gwar, GwÃ°r = Mindon Gwar (Kortirion). 291, 313; hill of Gwar 313; Prince of Gwar 313, 323. Gwarthyryn 307. See CaergwÃ°r.

Gwarestrin âTower of Guardâ, one of the Seven Names of Gondolin. 158

Gwasgonin âWinged Helmsâ, earlier name for the Forodwaith. 334

Gwedheling Queen of Artanor; name replacing Gwendeling in the Tale of Turambar. 73, 76, 94Ã°6, 119, 244; Gwedhiling (replacing Gwendeling in the Gnomish dictionary) 50, 119, 244. See Artanor.

Gwendelin Queen of Artanor; name replaced by Gwenniel in the Tale of the Nauglafring. 228, 231Ã°5, 237, 239Ã°40, 243Ã°4, 246, 249Ã°50. See Artanor.

Gwendeling Queen of Artanor; name replacing Wendelin in the Tale of TinÃ°viel. 8Ã°10, 12, 14Ã°15, 17Ã°19, 22Ã°3, 30, 33, 35Ã°7, 49Ã°51, 63Ã°4, 66, 119, 243Ã°4. See Artanor.

Gwenethlin Queen of Artanor; name replaced by Melian in the typescript text of the Tale of TinÃ°viel. 51, 244, 259

Gwenniel Queen of Artanor; name replacing Gwendelin in the Tale of the Nauglafring. 223, 225, 227, 230, 243Ã°4, 249. See Artanor.

Gwindor Elf of Nargothrond, companion of Târin (earlier Flinding). 62, 123â4. See Flinding.

Â

Hador, House of 120, 126

HÃ|gwudu See Great Haywood, Heorrenda.

Half-elven 130, 215, 265â6, 293

Hall of Play Regained In Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va. 4

Hall(s) of Iron Angamandi. 166, 264; halls of darkness 169

Hammer of Wrath Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim. 174, 176, 179, 183, 218. See Rog (2), Stricken Anvil.

Happy Mariners, The (poem) 273â6

Harbourless Isle(s) 317â18, 324â5, 331â2; Isle of the Old Man 322; other references to the Isles 5, 7, 311, 315â16, 333

Harbour of the Lights of Many Hues In Tol EressÃ«a. 321; Haven of Many Hues 322, 333

Harp, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim. 173, 182. See Salgant.

Hasen of IsenÃ³ra Uncle of Ottor Wæfre (Eriol); alternative to Beorn. 291

Haudh-en-Elleth The Mound of Finduilas. 130. See Finduilas.

Haven of the Moon 269

Haven of the Sun 266, 268â9

Haven of the Swans See Swanhaven.

Havens of Sirion See Sirion.

Heath of the Sky-roof, Battle of the 284â5, 287, 293; Battle of the High Heath, of the Heaven Roof 287. See Dor-na-Dhaideloth, Ladwen-na-Dhaideloth, Withered Heath.

Heavenly Arch, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim; also the Arch of Heaven, the Arch, the Rainbow. 173, 176, 179â83, 215. See Egalmoth.

Heaven Roof, Battle of the See Heath of the Sky-roof.

Heborodin The Encircling Hills about the plain of Gondolin. 166. See Encircling Mountains.

HelcaraxÃ« 209

Heligoland 290â2

Helgor Earlier name for Ãlfheah. 334. (Replaced by Gelimer.)

Hell Angamandi. 239

Hells of Iron Angamandi. 45, 61, 77, 157, 159, 161, 196, 206;

Hells of Melko 187. See Angamandi, Angband.

Hendor Servant of Idril who carried Eärendel from Gondolin.
190, 216

Hengest Son of Ottor Wæfre (Eriol), with his brother Horsa conqueror of Tol Eressëa. 290â4, 304, 323

Heorrenda (1) Son of Eriol, born in Tol Eressëa. 145, 197, 290â4, 323, 328, 334; Heorrenda of Hǫlgwudu 290, 292, 328; the Golden Book of Heorrenda 290. (2) In the Old English poem Dæd 323

Hiding of Valinor 317, 324â5, 332

High Faroth Highlands above Nargothrond. 124

High Hay 328

High Heath, Battle of the See Heath of the Sky-roof.

Hill of Spies 128â9. See Amon Ethir.

Hill of Watch 158; hill of vigilance 161, 208. See Amon Gwareth.

Hills of Iron See Iron Mountains.

Hirilorn âQueen of Treesâ in Artanor. 18â19, 46, 51, 54.
(Replaced Golosbrindi.)

HisilÃ³m 10â11, 13, 17, 21, 23, 31, 38, 43, 45, 47, 51, 61â6, 70, 88, 92, 102â3, 115, 117, 119â20, 126, 138, 140, 204, 215, 222, 234, 240, 243, 248â51, 280. See Aryador, Dor LÃ³min, Hithlum, Land of Shadow(s), Mathusdor.

Hithlum 61, 71â2, 74â7, 87, 120â2, 126â7, 131, 142, 204â5, 218, 238, 240â2, 248â52. See HisilÃ³m.

Horsa See Hengest. 290â4, 304, 323

House of a (the) Hundred Chimneys The house of Gilfanon at Tavrobel. 283â4, 310

Huan Called âlord of the Hounds of Hisilornâ (47), âCaptain of Dogsâ (21, 231), âHuan of the Dogsâ. 21â3, 26â7, 30â1, 34â6, 38â9, 41, 47â8, 53â9, 62, 68, 231, 233â4, 239, 243

Hungry Sands On the coast of the Isle of the Ancient Mariner. 318

Hunthor Companion of Turambar in the attack on Glaurung. 133

Huor 214

Hwârîn 52, 118, 120, 126, 128, 131, 135, 137, 210, 216, 245. See Arin.

Iceland 261

ÎÂ·Cuilwarthon The dead that live again. 41, 51, 245, 249.

(Replaced iÂ·Guilwarthon.)

Icy Seas 254

Idril Wife of Tuor, mother of EÂœrendel. 130, 162, 164â5, 167â70, 174, 177, 185â93, 199â201, 209â16, 219â20, 253â6, 260, 262â7, 276; Idril Talceleb, Idril of the Silver Feet 165, 199, 210, 216. See IrildÂœ.

ÎÂ·Guilwarthon The dead that live again. 51, 233, 243, 245; the Guilwarthon 240. (Replaced by iÂ·Cuilwarthon.)

Ilbranteloth See Cris Ilbranteloth.

Ilfiniol Littleheart, 5, 50, 144â5, 201, 221, 244. (Replaced Elfriniol, replaced by Ilfrin.)

Ilfrin Littleheart. 7, 50, 201. (Replaced Ilfiniol.)

Ilfrith Littleheart. 276

Ilinsor Spirit of the SÂœruli, steersman of the Moon. 259

Ilkorindi Elves ânot of KÂœrâ (see especially 64). 9, 64â5, 70; Ilkorin(s) 74, 122, 285

ÎÂœvatar 8, 42, 163, 209, 219, 223, 247, 283â4, 287; the Lord for Always 163, 209

Ilverin Littleheart. 201â2. (Replaced Elwenildo.)

IlwÂœ The middle air that flows among the stars. 281, 328

Incomers Easterlings. 126

Indor Father of Peleg father of Tuor. 160, 217. See Gon Indor, Indorildo.

Indorildo, Indorion Name of EÂœrendel, great-grandson of Indor. 217. See Gon Indor.

Indrafangs The Longbeard Dwarves of Belegost. 46, 68, 223, 230, 232â5, 243, 247â8; Indrafangin 234, Indravangs 19, 68. See especially 247.

Ing (1) Ing, IngwÂœ King of Luthany; many references are to his kin, sons, or descendants. 301â10, 312; on the relationship between Ing and IngwÂœ see 305. (2) Earlier name of InwÂœ. 305. (3) Ing in Old English legend. 305

Ingil Son of InwÂœ. 5â6, 258, 280â2, 289, 292, 305, 328. See Gil. Inguaeones See 304â5.

Ingwaiwar People deriving their origin from Ing(wÂœ) as their founder-ruler, Anglo-Saxons. 304â7, 309, 312, 323

IngwÂœ (1) See Ing(1). (2) Lord of the Vanyar. 305. See InwÂœ.

Ingwine See 305.

Inland Sea The Mediterranean. 294.

inwĀ« King of the Eldar of KĀ´r (later IngwĀ« Lord of the Vanyar). 208, 253, 258, 280, 282, 289, 292, 305; the Arch of InwĀ« in Gondolin 182

Inwir The royal clan of the Teleri (= the later Vanyar), kindred of InwĀ«. 4, 253, 255, 278, 281, 283

Inwithiel Gnomish name of InwĀ«. 258

Āras (Old English) The Irish. 290

Ireland 285, 293, 312, 323. See Āverin.

IrildĀ« Name of Idril in Eldarissa. 199, 210, 216, 254, 276;

IrildĀ« Taltelepta, IrildĀ« of the Silver Feet 216. See Idril.

Iron Crown See Melko.

Iron Mountains 10â11, 14, 43, 61, 70, 77, 140, 153, 215, 217, 279; Mountains of Iron 13, 156, 217; Hills of Iron 87, 154, 161, 169, 219, 279; Bitter Hills 12, 22, 29, 61. See Angorodin.

Isfin Sister of Turgon, mother of Meglin. 165, 168, 199, 210, 220, 248. See Aredhel.

Island-elves Elves of Tol EressĀ«a. 283, 285

Isle of Seabirds 253, 255â6, 259â60, 262, 264; tower on 264

Isle of Werewolves 53. See Tol-in-Gaurhoth.

IvĀjrĀ« Minstrel of the Elves, âwho plays beside the seaâ. 10, 59

Āverin, Isle of Ireland. 283, 285â6, 293, 323. See Ireland.

Ivrin See Eithel Ivrin.

Ā

Jutes 306. See Euti.

Ā

Kapalen Name preceding Tifanto (Dairon). 49â50

Karkaras âKnife-fangâ, âfather of wolvesâ. 19, 21, 31, 33â4, 36, 38â9, 56, 58â9, 68, 227, 231, 239; Carcaras 46, 68; Hell-wolf 38. See Knife-fang; Carcharoth.

Kingâs hall, palace, tower, fountain, square In Gondolin. See Square of the Palace.

Kingâs House, Royal House Of the Gondothlim. 172, 183â5, 187, 213

Kinslaying at Swanhaven 258

Knife-fang 21, 31, 33, 68, 227. See Karkaras.

KĀ´r City of the Elves in Eldamar and the hill on which it was built. 8â9, 42, 64, 71, 77, 115, 119, 123, 141, 145, 148â9, 161, 197, 202, 208, 215, 219, 253â65, 271â2, 278, 280, 285â6, 289, 291â2, 303â5, 307â8, 329; see especially 291â2, and see TÃ»n, TÃ»na, Tirion.

KÃ³pas Haven (of the Swanships). 255. See CÃ³pas Alqalunten.
Koreldar Elves of KÃ³r. 276

Korin Enclosure formed by elm-trees in which Meril-i-Turingi dwelt. 144, 197

Koromas The town of Kortirion. 280, 292

Kortirion Chief town of AlalminÃ³rÃ« in Tol EressÃ«a. 4, 7, 280, 282â3, 288â9, 291â3, 298, 300, 302, 307â8, 310, 313, 323â4. Poem Kortirion among the Trees 276, 328, prose preface 289, 308

Kosmoko, Kosomok(o) Name of Gothmog in Eldarissa. 216; Kosomot 216

KurÃ³ki An evil magician in a preliminary sketch of the Tale of Turambar. 138â9

Â

Ladwen-na-Dhaideloth 287; Ladwen Daideloth 287. See Dor-na-Dhaideloth, Heath of the Sky-roof.

LaiqalassÃ« Name of Legolas Greenleaf of Gondolin in Eldarissa. 217

Laiquendi The Green-elves of Ossiriand. 249

Land of Shadow(s) 61, 88, 149, 161, 166, 215, 218. See Aryador, Dor LÃ³min, HisilÃ³mÃ«, Hithlum, Mathusdor.

Land of the Dead that Live 249. See IÃ³-Cuilwarthon, IÃ³-Guilwarthon.

Land of Willows 140, 153â4, 195â6, 205, 214, 217, 278â80. See Nan-tathren, Tasarinan.

Land(s) Beyond Artanor. 9, 11, 21, 62, 72, 77, 91â2, 117, 126, 140. See Artanor, Doriath.

Lands Without The lands âwithout Valinorâ, i.e. the Great Lands. 233. See Outer Land(s).

Last Battle 138

Laurelin 216, 285

Laurundo, Laurunto Forms of the name of Glorund in Eldarissa. 84. See UndolaurÃ«.

Lay of Leithian 52, 54, 57, 67, 330

Lay of the Children of HÃ³rin 62

Legolas Greenleaf (1) Elf of Gondolin. 189, 191â2, 214, 217. See I. 267 and LaiqalassÃ«. (2) Elf of Mirkwood, member of the Fellowship of the Ring. 327

Leithian = LÃ«thien (3) (England). 330; Leithien 300

Lesser Market, Square of the In Gondolin. 182

Letters of J. R. R. Tolkien 265â7, 271, 329

LimpÃ« The drink of the Eldar. 279, 283â4, 290, 292, 306, 308, 310; given the Old English equivalent lip 290

LindelaurÃ«, LindeloktÃ« Names of Laurelin. 216

Lindo Elf of Tol EressÃ«a, master of Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ«va. 3, 70, 144â5, 219, 221, 258, 279, 284, 302

LinwÃ« (Tinto) Earlier name of TinwÃ« (Linto), Tinwelint. 49â50, 76, 92, 116â17, 135â8

Lionesse Legendary land now drowned between Cornwall and the Scilly Isles. 313â14. See Evadrien, Erenol.

Lisgardh Land of reeds at the Mouths of Sirion. 217. See Arlisgion.

Littleheart Son of Bronweg (VoronwÃ«), called âthe Gongwardenâ (of Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ«va). 197, 201, 221, 228, 244, 252, 254, 256, 263, 276. For his Elvish names see 201â2, 276.

LÃ«kÃ« Name in Eldarissa for the dragons of Melko. 85. See FoalÃ«kÃ«, Fuithlug.

Lonely Isle, Lonely Island 4â5, 7, 34, 148, 253, 289, 298, 301, 307, 311, 313, 316â17, 322â4, 326â7, 329; the Isle 42, 144, 283â4; the holy isle 291; Island of the Elves 320, 327; Old English se uncÃ«pa holm 290, seo unwemmede Ã«g 291, 301; speech of 34, 148; poem The Lonely Isle 291. See Tol EressÃ«a.

Longbeards See Indrafangs.

Lord of the Rings, The 211, 247, 266, 328; The Fellowship of the Ring 333; The Two Towers 140; The Return of the King 67, 216

Lord of Wolves ThÃ« (the Necromancer). 54

Lords of the West The Valar. 205

LÃ«rien 8â9, 33, 42â3, 240, 324

LÃ«s Earlier form of the name Loth of Gondolin. 202

LÃ«sengriol Earlier form of the name Lothengriol of Gondolin. 202

LosÃ«riol Name in Noldorissa of the Golden Flower (kindred of the Gondothlim); earlier Los GlÃ«riol. 216

Lost Elves Elves of the Great Lands. 9 (of Artanor), 40, 42, 283, 285, 293, 302; tongue of 22, 47. Lost Elves of HisilÃ«mÃ«

63â4, 249

Loth âThe Flowerâ, one of the Seven Names of Gondolin. 158, 202. (Replaced LÃ's.)

Lothengriol âFlower of the Plainâ, one of the Seven Names of Gondolin. 158, 202. See I. 172 and Flower of the Plain.

Lothlim âPeople of the Flowerâ, name taken by the survivors of Gondolin at the mouth of Sirion. 196, 201, 252, 259â60

Lug Orc slain by Tuor in Gondolin. 181

Lumbi A place where Melko dwelt after his defeat. 278â9

LÃ'sion = LÃ^othien (2). 302

Luthany England. 301â10, 323, 326â30, 334. See LÃ^othien (1) and (3), Leithian.

LÃ^othien (1) âMan of Luthanyâ, name given to Ælfwine by the Elves of Tol EressÃ«a. 301, 304, 309; explained as meaning âWandererâ, 302. (2) Son of Telumehtar 302. (3) = Luthany (England). 312â15, 323â4, 326â7, 329â30, 334. (4) TinÃ^oviel. 52â8, 66, 302, 330

Â

Mablung âThe Heavy-hand(ed)â, chief of the thanes of Tinwelint. 38â41, 49â50, 56, 59, 121, 128â30, 134, 231, 233, 243

Maeglin Later form for Meglin. 210â12, 248

Magbar Elvish name of Rome. 315, 330. See RÃ^om.

Magic Isles 5, 7, 254, 260, 311, 316, 320, 324â5, 332, 334; Magic Archipelago 316

Magic Sun 264, 281â2, 285â6, 289, 303; see especially 285â6

Maglor Son of FÃ«anor. 241, 250

Maia 246

Maidros Son of FÃ«anor. 241â2, 250

Malkarauki Name of the Balrogs in Eldarissa. 169

Mandos (both the Vala and his abode) 39â40, 53, 56, 60, 87, 92, 111, 113, 115, 125, 240, 250, 253â6, 260, 263â4, 278, 286. See VefÃ^ontur.

Man of the Sea The âancient marinerâ (Ulmo) dwelling in the Harbourless Isles. 316â20, 322, 325, 331â4; other references to him 5, 7, 301, 311â12, 332

ManwÃ«, ManwÃ« SÃ^olimo 77, 115, 141, 163, 165, 193, 199, 223, 257â8, 265, 280, 282, 287; SÃ^olimo 200; Lord of Gods and Elves 163; Manweg = WÃ³den, Ã^oinn 290

- March of the Elves, March of Liberation* See Elf-march, Faring Forth.
- Mar Vanwa TyaliĀva* The Cottage of Lost Play. 4, 41, 144â5, 149, 201, 209, 279, 286; Vanwa TyaliĀva 145
- Mathusdor* Name replacing Aryador in manuscript A of The Fall of Gondolin. 202
- MavoinĀ* Name of Mavwin in Eldarissa. 70
- Mavwin* Wife of Ārin, mother of TĀ^orin and NienĀ³ri; afterwards Morwen. 70â6, 78, 87â9, 91â9, 109, 112â17, 120â1, 126â9, 136â7, 139, 141â2, 144. (Replaced TirannĀ«.)
- Mediterranean* 261, 294. See WendelsĀ†.
- Meglin* Son of EĀ[†]il and Isfin, betrayer of Gondolin; afterwards Maeglin. 164â5, 167â73, 175, 177â8, 189â90, 206, 210, 213, 220; lord of the house of the Mole 175
- Meleth* EĀ^orendelâs nurse. 174
- Melian* Queen of Doriath. 42â4, 46, 48, 51, 66, 244, 249; the Girdle of Melian 63, 249. For earlier names of Melian see 244 and Gwedheling and following entries; see also Artanor.
- Melinir* Name given to VĀ«annĀ» by Eriol. 5â6
- Melinon* Name given to Eriol by VĀ«annĀ». 5â6, 41
- Melko* Selected references: his curse on Urin and his kin 71â2, 83, 86, 102; in relation to the origin of Orcs 14, 159, 219; hawks and snakes as creatures of Melko 166, 210; no power of flight 193; in relation to Men 165, 218, 282; Mines of Melko 65, 78, 174; Spell of Bottomless Dread 65, 77, 159, 169, 206; the Iron Crown 13, 33, 53, 56, 58, 239, 246; his throne 32, 169; myth of his defeat 281â2; attack on the Sun 281, 286. Called Ainu Melko, the Evil Prince, the Prince of Evil Heart, Vala of Iron, Lord of Iron, the Evil One, the Foe.
- Melkor* 216, 219
- Men* Selected references: confinement of Men in HisilĀ³mĀ» 10, 70â1, 74, 120, 161, 215, 218; Tuor the first Man to reach the Sea 151, 204; Ulmoâs choice of a Man 165, 218; tongues of Men 70; tales told by 70; fate of 59â60; stature of, see Elves; knowledge of IlĀ^ovatar 163, 209; union of Men and Elves 101, 130, 164, 199, 215, 219, 265; in relation to Melko 165, 218, 282; in Tol EressĀ«a 283â4
- Menegroth* The Thousand Caves in Doriath. 63, 129, 245. See Thousand Caves.
- Men of the North* (1) Tuorâs people. 160. (2) Forodwaith, Vikings. 313, 318. See Forodwaith, Gwasgonin.

Men of the Sea Forodwaith, Vikings. 304, 312
Men of the South Romans. 315, 330. See Romans, Rā'mhoth.
Meoita See Tevildo.
Meres of Twilight See Aelin-uial.
Meril-i-Turingi The Lady of Tol Eressā; also Meril, Turingi.
144â5, 197, 258, 280, 283â4, 290, 294; Lady of the Isle 144,
283â4
Mermaids 259â60, 263; seamaids 260. See Fiord of the Mermaid, Oarni.
Miaugion See Tiberth, Tifil.
Miaulā Tevildoâs cook. 28, 54
Micelgeard, Mickleyard (Old English, âthe great townâ) Rome, âthe Heartless Townâ. 330. See Rā'm.
Middle-earth 64, 266, 327, 333
Mikligarā°r (Old Norse) Constantinople. 330
Mā®m the Dwarf Called âthe fatherlessâ. 103, 113â14, 118, 122, 134, 137, 222â3, 230, 246; curse of, spell of, Mā®m 223,
228, 231, 233, 235, 238â41, 246, 264
Minas Morgul 216
Minas Tirith Fortress on Tol Sirion 55, 123
Mindon Gwar Gnomish name of Kortirion. 291â2, 313â14, 321, 324. See Gwar.
Mithrim Lake and (149, 153) the river flowing from it. 149, 151â3, 202, 204; Grey-elves of Mithrim 205. (Replaced Asgon.)
Mole, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim (House of the Mole, Mole-kin, Mole-folk, warriors of the Mole). 175, 177â8, 220; sign of the Mole 165, 171, 220; Meglinâs folk bore no emblem 172. See Meglin.
Moon, The Selected references: the Moon mariner or shipman chases Eārendel 255, 259, 262, 264, 269, 271; ship of 268â9; haven of 269; gateway of 272â3; recall of 285â6; imprisonment of 286; Melko seeks to hurt the Moon 281; beyond the Moon 162, behind the Moon 274â5, East of the Moon 271â2; an emblem of the Kingâs House in Gondolin 172
Morgoth 44, 58, 62, 67â8, 120, 124, 134, 138, 143, 204, 206, 210â11, 213, 328; see especially 67, and see Belcha, Melko(r).
Moria 329
Moriquendi âElves of the Darknessâ. 64
Mormagli âBlack Swordâ, Tā°rin (Gnomish). 84, 125. See Mormakil, Mormegil.

Mormakil âBlack Swordâ, TÃ°rin, said (84) to be one of the forms of the name among the Gnomes, though makil is an âEldarâ form (I. 259). 84, 86, 94, 112, 116, 118, 125, 128. See Mormagli, Mormegil.

Mormegil âBlack Swordâ, TÃ°rin (later form of the name). 125, 128

Morning Star 266

MÃ³ru The âPrimeval Nightâ personified in the Great Spider. 286

Morwen 120â1, 126â8, 135, 139. (Replaced Mavwin.)

Mound of Avarice See CÃ»m an-Idrisaith.

Mountain of the World See Taniquetil.

Mountains of Darkness = Mountains of Iron. 162

Mountains of Iron See Iron Mountains.

Mountains of Night The mountains on which grew Taurfuin, the Forest of Night. 20, 46, 62

Mountains of Shadow 61â2, 122, 205, 217. See Ered Wethrin.

Mountains of Terror See Ered Gorgoroth.

Mountains of the East 6, 295, 300, 311

Mountains of Valinor 161, 171, 285, 320, 325

Music of the Ainur (not including references to the Tale) 146, 163, 209. See AinulindalÃ«.

Â

Naimi Ãlfwineâs wife, Elf of Tol EressÃ«a. 290â1, 323, 330. See Ãadgifu (1).

Nan A Giant. 19, 46, 67â8

Nandorin 122

Nan Dumgorthin âThe Land of the Dark Idolsâ. 35, 62, 68; Nan Dumgorthin 62

Nan Dungortheb âThe Valley of Dreadful Deathâ. 62â3

Nan Elmoth 248

Nan-tathren 140, 214. See Land of Willows, Tasarinan.

Nargothrond 53â4, 56, 61, 123â6, 128â9, 131, 135, 137, 140â1, 205, 208, 245â6, 251; see especially 123â4

Narn i HÃ«n HÃ°rin 119â22, 124, 126â35, 142

Narog 123, 132, 135, 141, 244. See Aros.

Narthseg The Elf who betrayed Artanor to the Dwarves. 231, 243

Naugladur Lord of the Dwarves of Nogrod. 225, 230â8, 243, 246â7 (called king 225).

Nauglafring The Necklace of the Dwarves (references include both names). 41, 59, 72, 136â7, 144, 221, 227â8, 231â2, 234â5, 237â41, 243, 245â7, 252â6, 259, 264; see especially 228

Nauglath The Dwarves of Nogrod. 68, 136â7, 223â6, 229, 233â4, 243, 247, 328; see especially 247

Nautar Apparently = Nauglath. 136, 247, 283, 285, 328

NazgÂ»l 327

Necklace of the Dwarves See Nauglafring.

Necromancer, The 53â5

Nellas Elf of Doriath who bore witness at the trial of TÃ°rin. 121

Nen Girith âShuddering Waterâ, name given to the falls of Celebros in the Forest of Brethil. 130, 133â4, 140

Nen Lalaith Stream rising under Amon Darthir in Ered Wethrin. 126

Neorth âLord of Watersâ, Ulmo. 331â2. (Cf. the Scandinavian god NjÃ°rÃ°, especially associated with ships and the sea.)

Nessa 10, 218, 240

Nevrast 204, 208, 217

Nielluin Sirius. 282. See Bee of Azure.

Nielthi Handmaid of Gwendelin Queen of Artanor. 231â2

Nienor Later form for NienÃ³ri (see 118â19). 118â20, 128â30, 134â5

NienÃ³ri Daughter of Ærin and Mavwin. 71, 73â4, 87, 89, 91â9, 103, 109â11, 113, 115â21, 127â31, 134, 137â9, 142, 144. (Replaced VainÃ³ni.) See NÃ°niel.

Nieriltasinwa The Battle of Unnumbered Tears. 84. See NÃ°nin-Udathriol.

Nineveh See NinwÃ°.

NÃ°niel âChild of Tearsâ, Turambarâs name for NienÃ³ri. 100â8, 110â12, 117, 129â35, 141â2

NÃ°nin-Udathriol The Battle of Unnumbered Tears. 84. See Nieriltasinwa.

NinwÃ°, Ninwi Nineveh. 196, 203; Nineveh 203

Nirnaeth Arnoediad The Battle of Unnumbered Tears. 208, 211

Nivrim Doriath beyond Sirion. 249

Nogrod City of the Nauglath. 224â6, 229â30, 232, 235â6, 238, 245, 247â9

Noldoli See Gnomes; Noldor.

Noldor 120, 123, 204, 206, 246; adjective Noldorin 204.

(Replaced Noldoli.) See Gate of the Noldor.

Noldorin Name of Salmar. 154, 201, 219, 278â80

Noldorissa Language of the Noldoli. 149, 216, 280

NÃ³lemÃ« See FinwÃ« NÃ³lemÃ«.

Noon, Fruit of 271

Normans 301, 312, 323, 328

NornorÃ« Herald of the Gods. 60

Norse, Old Norse 125, 323, 330

Northern Venture, A (Anthology containing poems by J. R. R. Tolkien) 273

North Sea 290â1, 303, 307, 309

North Wind 261

Norway 323

Nos Galdon People of Galdor of Gondolin living in Tol EressÃ«a. 215. (Replaced by Nos nan Alwen.)

Nos nan Alwen 215. (Replaced Nos Galdon.)

Nost-na-Lothion The spring festival of âThe Birth of Flowersâ in Gondolin. 172, 202; rejected form Nost-na-Lossion 202

NÃ³menÃ³reans 325; Black NÃ³menÃ³rean 67

Â

Oarni Spirits of the Sea (identified with âmermaidsâ 259, identity denied 263). 253â4, 259â60, 263, 276. See Mermaids.

Oikeroi A cat, thane of Tevildo, slain by Huan. 27â8, 30â2, 55â8

Oinen See Uinen.

Old English (including citations, words, titles of poems) 197, 200, 266â7, 271, 276, 290â2, 294â5, 298, 301, 304â5, 309, 323, 325, 328â31. Old English spoken by the Elves of Tol EressÃ«a 301â2, 304, 309

Old Forest 328

OlÃ³rÃ« MallÃ« âThe Path of Dreamsâ. 48, 70, 119, 258. See Way of Dreams.

OlwÃ« Lord of the Solosimpi in Thingolâs place. 50. See Ellu (2).

Ãmar Youngest of the great Valar, called also Amillo. 279

Ãnen Earlier name of Uinen. 51

Orcobal Champion of the Orcs, slain by Ecthelion in Gondolin. 181

Orcs Selected references: origin of 14, 159, 219; children of Melko

193; described 99, 159â60; sight and hearing of 78â9, 165â6; wolfriders 44, 67, 84, 190, 195; Orcsâ blood in Meglin 165; sons of the Orcs 165; mercenaries of the Dwarves 230, 247. Singular Ork 202, plural Orqui 136, 202, 219. See Goblins. Orfalch Echor The great rift in the Encircling Mountains by which Gondolin was approached. 207, 211 Orgof Elf of Artanor, slain by TÃ°rin. 74â6, 122, 142 Orion 281â2, 302. See Telimektar. Orlin Man of HisilÃ³mÃ«, slain in Broddaâs hall by Turambar. 90 Orm Sea-captain of the Forodwaith, slayer of DÃ©or Ãlfwineâs father. 318â19, 323, 331 Orodreth Lord of the Rodothlim. 82â4, 98, 117, 123â4 OromÃ« 8, 42, 240, 279 Orqui Earlier plural of Orc (Ork). See Orcs. OssÃ« 150, 197, 254, 256, 263, 283, 285, 293, 304, 306â9, 323â4, 331 Ossirand 249 Ost Belegost See Belegost. Ãswine Prince of Gwar (Kortirion). 313, 323 ÃÃ°inn 290. See WÃ³den. Othrod A lord of the Orcs, slain by Tuor in Gondolin. 181 Ottor WÃ³fre Eriol. 290, 292; WÃ³fre 291 Outer Dark 273, 276 Outer Land(s) (1) The Great Lands (Middle-earth). 254, 265. See Lands Without. (2) The lands West of the Great Sea. 316â17, 324â5, 334 Outer Oceans, Outer Sea(s) 154, 160, 276. See Vai. Oxford 146, 269, 292â3, 295, 300, 323; (Old English) Oxenaford 292; poem The City of Present Sorrow 295â8. See Taruithorn, Taruktarna. Oxford English Dictionary 69, 147

Â

Palisor Region of the Great Lands where the Elves awoke. 8â9, 21, 42, 47, 49, 64â5, 115, 136, 141, 206, 307 PalÃ³rien Yavanna. 281, 328. See Belaurin. Parma Kuluinen 310. See Golden Book. Path of Dreams 119. See OlÃ³rÃ« MallÃ«, Way of Dreams. Peleg Father of Tuor. 88, 160, 181, 204

Penlod Called âthe Tallâ lord of the peoples of the Pillar and of the Tower of Snow in Gondolin. 173, 175, 179

Pereldar âHalf-elvenâ. 266. See Half-elven.

Pictures by J. R. R. Tolkien 123, 214

Pillar, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim. 173, 179. See Penlod.

Pine of Belaurin, Pine of Tavrobel 281â2, 310, 328

Place of the Fountain In Gondolin. 207

Place of the Gods In Gondolin. 164, 186â7, 199â200, 218. See Gar Ainion, Place of the Wedding.

Place of the King In Gondolin. See Square of the Palace.

Place of the Well In Gondolin. See Square of the Folkwell.

Place of Wedding The same as the Place of the Gods (see 164). 186, 200

Pools of Twilight Region on the lower course of Sirion, afterwards Aelin-uial, the Meres of Twilight. 195, 217, 220, 225, 248, 279â80. See Silent Pools, Umboth-muilin.

Pygmies 254

Â

Qenya With reference to the entries in the early âdictionaryâ of Qenya. 216, 264, 285, 292, 310

Quendi 219

Quenya 50, 140

Â

Rainbow, The 179. See Heavenly Arch.

Ramandur Earlier name of Sorontur. 203

Rider Haggard, Henry 329

Rimion Father of Egnor; Egnor bo-Rimion 22, 51

Rim of Earth (Also Worldâs Rim, Rim of Things, Lip of the World, (bar at the) Margin of the World) 151, 255, 260â2, 268â9, 274, 314, 316, 322, 325

Ring of Doom Earlier reading for Necklace of the Dwarves. 136

Road of Arches In Gondolin. 182

Road of Pumps In Gondolin. 186

Rodothlim Noldoli of the Caves with whom TÃrin sojourned (precursors of the Noldor of Nargothrond). 81â4, 91â2, 94â8, 107, 112â13, 117â19, 123â4, 128, 135â6, 140â2, 222â3, 226, 228, 236, 246, 248. (Replaced Rothwarin.)

Rog (1) Orcsâ name for Egnor father of Beren (Rog the Fleet) 45.

(2) Lord of the people of the Hammer of Wrath in Gondolin.

174â6, 178â80, 203, 211

Rohan 329

Romans 294, 304, 309, 330. See RÃºmhoth, Men of the South.

Rome See RÃºm.

Room of Logs In Mar Vanwa TyaliÃ©va. 197, 221; Room of the Tale-fire 298. See Tale-fire.

RÃºs (1) Promontory of the Great Lands; Battle of RÃºs. 283â6, 293, 302. (2) Capital of Tol EressÃªa. 302. (3) Name of Tol EressÃªa? 302. (4) See the Appendix on Names, p. 347.

Rothwarin Earlier name for the Rodothlim. 117, 119, 135â6

RÃºm Rome. 196, 203, 315, 330; Rome 203. (The form of the name with u is found in Old English; see 315.) See Magbar, Micelgeard.

RÃºmhoth Romans. 294, 304, 306, 309. See Romans, Men of the South.

RÃºmil 149, 209; Alphabet of RÃºmil 69; book of RÃºmil 217

RÃºsitaunon âSon of the weary forestâ (Eldarissa), name given to himself by Turambar. 89. See Dhrauthodavros.

Â

Saeros 121â2, 142

Saksani Saxons. 306

Salgant Lord of the people of the Harp in Gondolin. 173, 175, 177, 182, 190â1

Salmar Companion of Ulmo, called also Noldorin. 219, 279

Sandyman, Ted 333

Sarnathrod âStony Fordâ. 236. Later form Sarn Athrad 249. See Stony Ford.

Sarqindi âCannibal-ogresâ. 254

Sauron 53â5, 57; Wolf-Sauron 55; Mouth of Sauron 67

Saxons 306. See Saksani.

Scarlet Heart, *The Emblem of the King*âs House in Gondolin. 172, 200

Sea-wing See EÃ©rrÃ©jmÃª.

Shadow-folk of HisilÃ©mÃª 64, 215, 249

Shadowy Seas Region of the Great Sea west of Tol EressÃªa. 256, 275, 286, 324â5; the great (sea-) shadows 260, 272; the

Shadows 316

Shining Isles Dwelling of the Gods and the Eldar of Valinor as imagined by the Ilkorins. 142

Shipmen, Ship-folk, of the West The Ythlings. 319, 322, 325, 331, 334. See Eneathrim, Ythlings.
Shippey, T. A. The Road to Middle-earth, 57
Shoreland Pipers 42; pipers of the shore 8; shoreland Elves 304. See Solosimpi.
Shores of Faëry See Faëry.
Sigurd Fafnisbane 125

Silent Pools, Battle of the 278-9. See Pools of Twilight, Umbothmuilin.
Silmarillion, The 50, 52-9, 61-6, 68, 119-21, 123-31, 134-5, 137, 139-42, 145, 204, 206-14, 216-17, 245, 247-9, 251, 257-9, 261-2, 264-5, 292, 300, 305, 324, 328
Silmaril(s) 13, 30, 33-4, 36-40, 53, 56-8, 95, 136-7, 223-4, 227-8, 238-41, 245-6, 259, 265; Lamp of Faëry, Lamp of Fëanor 238
Silpion The silver tree of Valinor. 33, 215, 285
Silver Bowl, Fall of the 101, 105-6, 110-11, 115, 130, 132-5, 140
Sindarin 50
Singoldo Replaced Tinwë Linto. 41, 51. Later form Singollo 50
Sirion 41, 47, 53, 62, 77, 81, 91, 123, 137, 141, 153-7, 161-2, 165, 195-6, 198, 201, 207-9, 211, 214, 217, 242, 249, 252; Doriath beyond Sirion 249. References to the Mouth(s) of Sirion and the dwellings there (Sirion often = the dwellings at the Mouth of Sirion) 196, 205-6, 209, 214-15, 217, 252-6, 258-63, 265, 276, 279; Isle(s) of Sirion 254, 262
Sirius 282. See Bee of Azure, Nielluin.
Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl 254, 256, 263, 274, 276. See Tower of Pearl.
Solosimpi 8, 42, 50, 253, 255, 258, 278, 281, 303; Solosimpë 261. See Shoreland Pipers.
Song of Eriol, The (poem) 298-300
Sons of Fëanor 44, 65, 220, 241-2, 245, 248, 250-1, 259
Sornontur The house of Tuor at the Mouth of Sirion. 201
Sorontur King of Eagles. 192, 203. (Replaced Ramandur.) See Thorndor.
Sorrowful City, The (poem) 295, 298
Spell of Bottomless Dread See Melko.
Square of the Folkwell In Gondolin. 181; Place of the Well 179,

- Square of the Palace* In Gondolin; also called Square of the King, Kingâs Square, Place of the King. 160, 179, 182â6, 212, 216
 The kingâs hall(s), house, or palace 160, 183â7, 199â200, 207; the kingâs tower 160, 180, 185â7, 200, 207â8, 212; the kingâs fountain 162, 176, 182â4, 189, 215
- Staffordshire* 292, 328
- Stapledon Magazine* 273
- Stars* Selected references: 274â5, 281, 317
- Stony Ford* 236â8, 250. See Sarnathrod.
- Stricken Anvil*, The Emblem of the people of the Hammer of Wrath in Gondolin. 174, 179
- SÃºlimo* See ManwÃº.
- Sun*, The Selected references. First rising of 9â10, 20, 65â6, 116, 208; accounts of sunset 261, 320, 325; ship of 281â2, 286; haven(s) of 266, 268â9; recall of 285â6; imprisonment of 286; Melkoâs attack on 281, 286; dwelling of 255, 276; Sun-dwellers 261; beyond the Sun 162, West of the Sun 271â2; an emblem of the Kingâs House in Gondolin 172. See Magic Sun, Urwendi.
- Sundering Seas* 264
- Swallow*, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim. 173, 176, 178â83, 193. See Duilin (2).
- Swan* As emblem of Tuor and of his men in Gondolin (swanwings on helm and shield). 152, 164, 172, 193, 205, 210, 276; house of the Swan 160. See AlqarÃºmÃº, Swanwing, Wing.
- Swanhaven* 258; Haven of the Swans 11, 65. See CÃºpas Alqalunten, KÃºpas.
- Swanwing* Tuorâs ship. 253â5, 260, 263, 265. See AlqarÃºmÃº.

Â

- Taimonto* = Telimektar. 281, 328; Taimondo 328
- Talath Dirnen* The Guarded Plain of Nargothrond. 61
- Talceleb* See Idril.
- Tale-fire* In Mar Vanwa TyaliÃºva. 144â5, 197, 221, 252. See Room of Logs, TÃºn a Gwedrin.
- Tale of Years* 208
- Taltelepta* See IrildÃº.
- Tamar Lamfoot* Son of Bethos of the Woodmen. 101, 103, 106, 108â11, 130, 132â4, 215. (Replaced by Brandir.)

Taniquetil 77, 141, 161, 163, 171, 202, 257, 262, 265, 271â2;
Mountain of the World 77
*Tanyasalp*Â« âBowl of Fireâ. 138. See Fauri, Faskalan, FÃ's âAlmir.
Tarnin Austa 172. See Gates of Summer.
Taruithorn, Taruktarna Gnomish and Eldarissa names of Oxford.
292â3 Tasarinan The Land of Willows. 140, 225, 248, 278; the Battle of Tasarinan 70, 140, 154, 219â20, 278â9. See Land of Willows, Nan-tathren.
Taurfuin The Forest of Night. 34â5, 47, 62, 78. Later form Taur- nu-Fuin 62, 123. See Forest of Night.
*Tauross*Â«, Tavaros(sÃ«) Eldarissa forms for Tavrobel. 292 Tavrobel 145, 283â4, 287â9, 292â3, 307, 310, 323, 326; Tavrobel the Old 310, the New 310; tower of 287; bridge and joining rivers at 288â9; Golden Book of 285, 310; Tales of 290. See Gilfanon, Great Haywood, Pine of Belaurin.
Tavrost = Tavrobel. 292
Teiglin 130, 132, 135, 140, 249; Crossings of Teiglin 127, 130, 132; ravines of 132â4
Telchar Dwarf smith of Nogrod. 58, 129
Teld Quing Ilon âRainbow Roofâ, earlier name for (Cris)
Ilbranteloth. 202
Teleri The first kindred of the Elves (afterwards called Vanyar).
4, 253, 255, 278, 307

Telimektar Son of Tulkas; Orion. 281â2; Telumektar 302, Telumaith 302. See Taimonto.
Tevildo Prince of Cats 15â17, 21â33, 35, 45, 49, 51, 53â6, 58, 281; Tevildo Vardo Meoita 15, Meoita 54. See Tiberth, Tifil.
Thames 295, 297
Thingol 42â3, 45â6, 50â2, 63, 65, 69, 127â9, 245â6, 251; Elu
Thingol 50; Thingol of the Woods 43, 251. (Replaced Tinwelint.)
Third Age 216, 327
Thompson, Francis 329
Thorndor Gnomish name of Sorontur King of Eagles. 192â4, 202.
Later form Thorondor 251
Thornhoth âPeople of the Eaglesâ. 192â3
Thorn Sir Falling stream below Christhorn. 192â4; Eagle-stream 194 PÃ³rr 290. See Punor.

Thousand Caves 245, 248. See Menegroth.

ThÃ» The Necromancer. 54

Punor Old English name of the Germanic god in Old Norse called porr; by Eriol identified with Tulkas. 290

Thuringwethil Bat-messenger of Sauron from Tol-in-Gaurhoth. 57

Tiberth Gnomish name of Tevildo Prince of Cats. (Replaced Tifil.)

45, 47â9, 51; Tiberth Bridhon Miaugion 45, Miaugion 54

Tifanto Earlier name for Dairon. 49â50, 59. (Replaced Kapalen.)

Tifil Gnomish name of Tevildo Prince of Cats. (Replaced by Tiberth.) 15, 45, 51; Tifil Bridhon Miaugion 15

Timpinen Name of Tinfang in Eldarissa. 4, 59

Tindriel Earliest name of Melian. 50, 244

Tinfang Gnomish name of Timpinen; called Tinfang Warble

(Gnomish Gwarbilin âBirdwardâ, I. 268). 10, 59

Tinthellon Earlier (Gnomish) name of Tinwelint. 51, 69, 116,

118â19

Tintoâellon See Tinthellon. 50â1

Tinto Ellu Earlier (Eldarissa) name of TinwÃ« Linto. 50â1, 69

Tintoglin Earlier (Gnomish) name of Tinwelint. 69, 71, 116â19,

136â7

TinÃ«viel 8, 10â14, 17â38, 40â3, 45â9, 51â63, 66, 68, 72, 116, 123, 139â40, 215, 223, 233â4, 238â40, 243, 246â7, 249â50, 252, 259, 302, 330. See LÃ«thien (4).

Tinwelint King of Artanor (later Thingol); called âthe hidden kingâ. 8â10, 12â14, 17â20, 26, 32, 35â41, 50â3, 56, 59, 61, 63â5, 69, 72â4, 76â7, 79, 91â5, 102â3, 113â17, 119, 121, 127â9, 132, 135â7, 140â1, 144, 221â34, 236â9, 243, 245, 249â51, 259. Other Gnomish names: Ellon, Tinthellon, Tintoâellon, Tintoglin.

TinwÃ« (Linto) Name of Tinwelint in Eldarissa. 8, 50â1, 63, 116. (Replaced by Singoldo.)

TirannÃ« Earliest name of Mavwin (Morwen). 138â9

Tirin âTowerâ Ingilâs Tirin 5â6

Tirion 207â8, 246, 257, 265, 292

TÃ«w Old English name of the Germanic god in old Norse called TÃ½r. 290

Tol EressÃ«a 4â5, 7â8, 42, 215, 217, 253, 255, 258â9, 263â4, 278, 280â1, 283â6, 289â94, 300â12, 323â4, 326â8, 330, 333â4. See Lonely Isle.

Tol-in-Gaurhoth Isle of Werewolves. 53, 56
Tol Sirion 55, 123
Tā́n a Gwedrin The Tale-fire in Mar Vanwa Tyaliëva. 145, 197. See Tale-fire.
Tower of Pearl 256, 260, 263, 273. See Sleeper in the Tower of Pearl.
Tower of Snow Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim. 173, 179. See Penlod.
Town of Dreams, The (poem) 295, 298 (The Town of Dead Days 298).
Tree, The Name of one of the kindreds of the Gondothlim. 173, 176, 182, 189, 215, 217. See Galdor, Nos Galdon.
Treebeard 140
Tree-men 254, 261
Trees of Gondolin See Gondolin.
Trolls 283
Trui Troy. 196, 203; Troy 203
Tulkas 19, 46, 68, 138, 195, 201, 220, 278, 83, 290
Tumhalad Battle in which the host of Nargothrond was defeated. 135
Tumladin Valley of smoothness (163), the plain or vale of Gondolin. 163, 167, 171, 174, 179, 194, 200, 211, 214, 217
Tumultuous Winds, Cavern of the Where the river Sirion went underground. 195, 217
Tā́n Later name of Kā́r (see 292). 202, 262, 292; Hill of Tā́n 313, 330
Tā́na 208, 292
Tuor 88, 123, 130, 144, 148, 174, 180, 210, 212, 240, 252, 259, 276, 278, 325. See Tā́r. The later Tuor, in Unfinished Tales, 203, 211, 217, 219
Tā́r Form of Tuor's name. 148, 198, 202, 260
Turambar Conqueror of Fate (86). 41, 70, 86, 91, 99, 112, 116, 119, 125, 129, 137, 140, 142, 282. See Turumart, Tā́rin.
Turgon 43, 65, 70, 73, 77, 83, 120, 160, 164, 167, 170, 173, 175, 177, 180, 182, 199, 200, 204, 216, 251, 257, 263, 266. See Turondo, Square of the Palace, King's House.
Tā́rin 21, 41, 47, 62, 70, 79, 86, 91, 98, 110, 112, 115, 31, 134â5, 137â8, 140â2, 144, 205, 222, 252. See Turambar.

Turingi See Meril-i-Turingi.
Turondo Name of Turgon in Eldarissa. 70â1
Turuhalm« The âLogdrawingâ, bringing in of wood to Mar
 Vanwa TyaliÃ©va. 69
Turumart Gnomish form for Turambar. 70, 86, 89, 119. See Turambar.

Twilit Isles 256, 273, 275, 324â5; Twilit Isle 254
Two Trees (including references to the Trees) 3, 9, 64, 160, 207, 216, 271â2, 275â6, 281, 286â7, 307â8; Tree of Gold 33. Trees of Gondolin, see Gondolin.
Tynwfiel Original spelling of *Tin*Ã©viel in the typescript text of the *Tale of Tin*Ã©viel. 41, 51
*T*Ã½r 290. See *T*Ãw.

Â

Ufedhin A Gnome, allied with the Dwarves, ensnarer of Tinwelint. 223â30, 232â6, 239, 243, 245â8
Uin The great whale. 283, 286, 328
Uinen 20, 51; Oinen 324; Ãnen 51
Ulbandi Mother of Kosomot (Gothmog). 216. See Fluithuin.
Ulmo Called âLord of Watersâ (150, 205), âLord of the Seaâ
 (316, 319). 7, 77, 125, 150, 152â7, 159â62, 164â5, 167, 184, 195â8, 204â5, 208â9, 217â19, 253â4, 256â7, 260, 263â4, 269, 279, 283, 308, 311, 316, 319, 328, 331; described 154â5. See Man of the Sea, Neorth.
Ulmonan Ulmoâs halls in the Outer Ocean. 154
Ãmanyar Eldar ânot of Amanâ. 64
Umboth-muilin The Pools of Twilight. 225, 248. See Pools of Twilight, Silent Pools; Aelin-uial.
Umuiyan Tevildoâs doorkeeper. 24â5. See Gumniow.
Undolaur« Name of Glorund in Eldarissa. 84. See Laurundo.
Unfinished Tales 119, 123, 146, 203, 207, 329. See *Narn i H*Ã©n
*H*Ã©rin, Tuor.
Ungweliant(Ã©) 11, 254, 256, 261, 286; the Spider 261. See Gloomweaver, *Wiril*Ã³mÃ©.
Ãrin Father of *T*Ã©rin and *Nien*Ã³ri; called âthe Steadfastâ. 44â5, 52, 70â4, 79, 82, 86â7, 89â91, 93â6, 102, 109â16, 118â20,
 128, 135â9, 141, 144, 221â2, 226, 230, 242, 245â6, 250;

Ärin of the Woods 112. (Replaced by HÄrin.)
Urwendî Mistress of the Sun. 116, 281â2, 286
Ävanîmor See 136, 247

Ä

Vai The Outer Ocean. 273

VainÄ³ni Earliest name of Nienor(i). 138â9

VairÄ« Wife of Lindo. 8, 144, 257, 286, 290, 302

Valar (also Vali, 243). Selected references (including Gods).

Passages concerning the relations of the Valar (Gods, Ainur) to Elves and Men: 5, 7, 15, 19, 35, 37, 44â5, 47, 68, 72â3, 76, 79, 101, 111, 115â16, 141, 151â2, 161, 188, 198, 200, 204, 219, 280, 282, 295. Warfare of the Gods 312, 323; Wrack of the Gods 285; withdrawal from the affairs of Men 283, 285; reverence for (in Gondolin) 165, 174, 218. Vala of the Western Isles 95, 141. TÄrin and NienÄ³ri âas shining Valarâ 116. See Great Folk of the West, Lords of the West, Children of the Gods.

Valinor 3, 9â10, 15, 34, 40, 42, 54, 58, 60â1, 65, 77â8, 82, 87, 114, 125, 129, 140, 160â2, 207â9, 215â16, 218, 222â3, 228, 232â3, 239â40, 246, 249â50, 253, 255â8, 260, 262â5, 271â2, 278â83, 285â7, 289, 292, 302â3, 307â8, 316, 325â6, 328; God-home 316, 325. See Mountains of Valinor, Hiding of Valinor.

Valmar 60, 253, 257; Valimar 257

ValwÄ« Father of Lindo. 219, 278â9. [Note. The definition of ValwÄ« as Father of VairÄ« wife of Lindo in the Index to Part I is an error. *VairÄ«*âs father was Tulkastor. Similarly 1.22 *VairÄ«*âs father should read *Lindo*âs father.]

VÄjna 218, 240

Vanyar 305

Varda 281

VÄ«annÄ« A child of Mar Vanwa TyaliÄ©va, teller of the Tale of TinÄ³viel. 4â8, 40â2, 50â1, 53, 66, 68, 294, 300â1. See Melinir.

VefÄjntur âFantur of Deathâ, the Vala Mandos. 115

Venus 266

Vettar Wood-rangers(?). 101

Vikings 322â3, 330â1, 333. See Forodwaith, Gwasgonin, Winged Helms.

Vingelot See Wingilot.

Vinyamar Turgonâs dwelling in Nevrast. 204â5, 217

Voice of Goth Gothmog. 67

Voronwâ« Form of Bronwegâs name in Eldarissa. Called âthe faithfulâ (156). 145, 149, 156â60, 162, 166, 178, 186â8, 195, 198, 200, 203, 205â7, 209, 214â15, 254â6, 258, 260, 263â5, 286. See Bronweg.

Â

Wâfre See Ottor Wâfre.

Wall of Things 259; the Wall 317, 325; Western Walls 320, 325;
Wall of Space 274

Warwick 292â3, 295, 300, 308, 310, 328; Warwickshire 324; poem The Town of Dreams 295â6, 298

Waters of Awakening 64, 197, 285

Way of Dreams 8, 42, 48. See OlÃ³rÃ³ MallÃ³« Path of Dreams.

Way of Escape 158, 163, 166â7, 177, 189, 195, 210, 213â14. See especially 206â7, and see Bad Uthwen.

Way of Running Waters In Gondolin. 186

WÃ©alas (Old English) The Welsh. 290; adjective WÃ©elisc 292

Wendelin Early name of Melian. 8, 48â51, 63, 244

WendelsÃ³ (Old English) The Mediterranean Sea. 294

Wessex 301â2

Westerland 267â8

Western Isles, Western Islands 5, 332; Islands of the West 331; Vala of the Western Isles 95, 141

Western Sea(s) 5â7, 294, 299â300, 311, 315, 320, 330. See Great Sea.

West Wind 261

WÃ©elisc See WÃ©alas.

Wing, The Emblem of Tuor, see Swan; White Wing 172; men, folk, guard, of the Wing in Gondolin 174, 176â8, 180, 182, 190, 192

Winged Helms The Forodwaith. 330, 334. See Gwasgonin.

Wingildi Spirits of the sea-foam. 276

Wingilot âFoam-flowerâ, EÃ³rendelâs ship. 145, 253â4, 256, 260â1, 263; Wingelot 260, 262, 272; Vingelot 262, 272

WirilÃ³mÃ³ âGloomweaverâ. 260â1. See Ungweliant(Ã³).

Withered Dale Where Tevildo encountered Huan. 48, 56

Withered Heath Heath near Tavrobel, after the Battle of the Heath of the Sky-roof. 284, 287

Wāden Old English name of the Germanic god in Old Norse called Án; by Eriol identified with Manwā. 290

Wolfriders See Orcs.

Wolf-Sauron 55

Woodland Elves Elves of Artanor. Also Woodelves, Elves of the wood(land), of the forest, etc. 11, 13, 18, 34â5, 37, 43, 45, 52, 63, 65â6, 69, 73â4, 78, 92, 142, 222â3, 228, 242â3, 245â6; wood(land) fairies 23, 35, 63; hidden Elves 10; secret Elves 11, 73, 123

Woodmen (later Woodmen of Brethil) Also woodfolk, wood(land)-rangers. 91, 100â8, 112â13, 125, 127, 130â5, 138, 141â2. See Vettar.

Â

Yavanna 286. See Belaurin, Palârien.

Year of Lamentation 120

Ythlings âChildren of the Wavesâ. 319â20, 322, 325, 331â2, 334; Ythlingas 331; described, 318. See Eneathrim, Shipmen of the West.

About the Author

The Book of Lost Tales was the first major work of imagination by J. R. R. Tolkien, begun in 1916â17 when he was 25 years old, and left incomplete several years later. It stands at the beginning of the entire conception of Middle-Earth and Valinor, for the Lost Tales were the first form of the myths and legends that came to be called The Silmarillion. Embedded in English legend and English association, they are set in the narrative frame of a great westward voyage over the Ocean by a mariner named Eriol (or Ælfwine) to Tol Eressëa, the Lonely Isle, where Elves dwelt; from them he learned their true history, the Lost Tales of Elfinesse. In the Tales are found the earliest accounts and original ideas of Gods and Elves, Dwarves, Balrogs, and Orcs; of the Silmarils and the Two Trees of Valinor; of Nargothrond and Gondolin; of the geography and cosmography of the invented world.

The Book of Lost Tales is published in two volumes; the first contains the Tales of Valinor, and this second part includes Beren and Lúthien, Tárion and the Dragon, and the only full narratives of the Necklace of the Dwarves and the Fall of Gondolin. Each tale is followed by a commentary in the form of a short essay, together with the texts of associated poems, and each volume contains extensive information on names and vocabulary in the earliest Elvish languages. Further books in this series are planned to extend the history of Middle-Earth as it was refined and enlarged in later years, and will include the long Lays of Beleriand, the Ambarkanta or Shape of the World, the Lhammas or Account of Tongues, annals, maps, and many other unpublished writings of J. R. R. Tolkien.

Â

Visit www.AuthorTracker.com for exclusive information on your favorite HarperCollins authors.

ከኋላ ርቀው ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ
ከግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ

Other Books by J. R. R. Tolkien
THE HISTORY OF MIDDLE-EARTH

I

THE BOOK OF LOST TALES, PART ONE

II

THE BOOK OF LOST TALES, PART TWO

III

THE LAYS OF BELERIAND

IV

THE SHAPING OF MIDDLE-EARTH

V

THE LOST ROAD AND OTHER WRITINGS

VI

THE RETURN OF THE SHADOW

VII

THE TREASON OF ISENGARD

VIII

THE WAR OF THE RING

IX

SAURON DEFEATED

X

MORGOTHâS RING

XI

THE WAR OF THE JEWELS

XII

THE PEOPLES OF MIDDLE-EARTH

ከኋላ ርቀው ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ
ከግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ ለግብፅ ሕግ

Copyright

HarperCollins Publishers
77&85 Fulham Palace Road,
Hammersmith, London W6 8JB www.tolkien.co.uk

www.tolkienestate.com

This edition published by HarperCollins Publishers 2010

First published by George Allen & Unwin 1984

® and ® are registered trade marks of The J.R.R. Tolkien Estate Limited

THE BOOK OF LOST TALES, PART II. Copyright © The J.R.R. Tolkien Copyright Trust and C.R. Tolkien 1984. All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. By payment of the required fees, you have been granted the non-exclusive, non-transferable right to access and read the text of this e-book on-screen. No part of this text may be reproduced, transmitted, down-loaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereinafter invented, without the express written permission of HarperCollins e-books.

EPub Edition © April 2010 ISBN: 978-0-06-210600-1

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

About the Publisher

Australia

HarperCollins Publishers (Australia) Pty. Ltd.
25 Ryde Road (PO Box 321)
Pymble, NSW 2073, Australia
<http://www.harpercollinsebooks.com.au>

Canada

HarperCollins Publishers Ltd.
55 Avenue Road, Suite 2900
Toronto, ON, M5R, 3L2, Canada
<http://www.harpercollinsebooks.ca>

New Zealand

HarperCollins Publishers (New Zealand) Limited
P.O. Box 1
Auckland, New Zealand
<http://www.harpercollins.co.nz>

United Kingdom

HarperCollins Publishers Ltd.
77-85 Fulham Palace Road
London, W6 8JB, UK
<http://www.harpercollinsebooks.co.uk>

United States

HarperCollins Publishers Inc.
10 East 53rd Street
New York, NY 10022
<http://www.harpercollinsebooks.com>

* Footnote in the manuscript: Tifil (Bridhon) Miaugion or Tevildo (Vardo) Meoita.

* Written above Umuiyan here is the name Gumniow, enclosed within brackets.

* The long unfinished poem in rhyming couplets in which is told the story of Beren and Lúthien Tinávíel; composed in 1925â31, but parts of it substantially rewritten many years later.

* Cf. Professor T. A. Shippey, The Road to Middle-earth, 1982, p. 193: "In Beren and Lúthien as a whole there is too much plot. The other side of that criticism is that on occasion Tolkien has to be rather brisk with his own inventions. Celegorm wounds Beren, and the hound Huan turns on his master and pursues him; returning he brought to Lúthien a herb out of the forest. With that leaf she stanch[ed] Beren's wound, and by her arts and her love she healed him." The motif of the healing herb is a common one, the centre for instance of the Breton lai of Eliduc (turned into conte by Marie de France). But in that it occupies a whole scene, if not a whole poem. In The Silmarillion it appears only to be dismissed in two lines, while Beren's wound is inflicted and healed in five. Repeatedly one has this sense of summary. This sense is eminently justified! In the Lay of Leithian the wounding and the healing with the herb occupy some 64 lines. (Cf. my Foreword to The Silmarillion, p. 8.)

* In an early note there is a reference to the sacred Silmarils: I. 169, note 2.

* The idea that Timpinen (Tinfang Warble) was the son of Tinwelint and sister of Tināviel (see I. 106, note 1) had been abandoned. Tifanto/Dairon is now named with Tinfang and Ivālrā as the three most magic players of the Elves (p. 10).

* In the outlines for Gilfanon's Tale the "Shadow Folk of Hisil-mâ" have ceased to be Elves and become "fays" whose origin is unknown: I. 237, 239.

* In the Tale of Turambar the story of Beren and TinÃviel clearly and necessarily took place before the Battle of Unnumbered Tears (pp. 71â2, 140).

* Nothing is said in any text to suggest that Gothmog played such a role in relation to Morgoth as the interpretation 'Voice of Goth' implies, but nor is anything said to contradict it, and he was from the beginning an important figure in the evil realm and in especial relation to Melko (see p. 216). There is perhaps a reminiscence of 'the Voice of Morgoth' in 'the Mouth of Sauron', the Black Númenórean who was the Lieutenant of Barad-dûr (The Return of the King V. 10).

* Gondolin

* At the bottom of the manuscript page is written:

âNieriltasinwa the battle of unnumbered tears

Glorund Laurundo or Undolaur»â

Later Glorund and Laurundo were emended to Glorunt and Laurunto.

* A note on the manuscript referring to this name reads: âTurumart go-Dhrauthodauros [emended to bo-Dhrauthodavros] or Turambar RĀ'sitaurion.â

* In the margin is written Firilanda.

* In the margin, apparently with reference to the word âwood-rangersâ, is written Vettar.

* From the first of these passages it seems that when Beren came to Nargothrond the "secret" policy was already pursued under Felagund; but from the second it seems that it came into being from the potent rhetoric of Curufin after Beren went there.

â In The Silmarillion she is named Finduilas, and the name Faclivrin âwhich is the gleam of the sun on the pools of Ivrinâ was given to her by Gwindor (pp. 209â10).

* In a later rewriting of a passage in that tale (p. 164 and note 22) it is said of Tuor and Idril of Gondolin: "Thus was first wed a child of Men with a daughter of Elfinesse, nor was Tuor the last."

* Cf. his words to Mablung in the Narn, p. 144: "For see, I am blind! Did you not know? Blind, blind, groping since childhood in a dark mist of Morgoth!"

* Tasarinan survived as the Quenya name without change: the willow-meads of Tasarinan in Treebeard's Song in The Two Towers, 111.4.

* The Gnomish dictionary has the entry: gwalt âgood luckâany providential occurrence or thought: âthe luck of the Valarâ, iÂwalt ne Vanionâ (1.272).

* Humphrey Carpenter in his Biography (p. 92) says that the tale was written out during Tolkien's convalescence at Great Haywood early in 1917, but he is doubtless referring to the original pencilled text of Tuor A.

* Faintly pencilled above in Tuor B: Idril Talceleb.

* Pencilled above in Tuor B: Heborodin.

* Of the story of Gondolin from Tuorâs coming to its destruction my father wrote nothing after the version of âThe Silmarillionâ made (very probably) in 1930; and in this the old conception of its history was still present. This was the basis for much of Chapter 23 in the published work.

* This is in fact specifically denied in The Silmarillion: âshe contrived it that the work was known but to few, and no whisper of it came to Maeglinâs ears.â

â It seems that the âcreatures of bloodâ (said to be disliked by the people of Gondolin, p. 166), snakes, wolves, weasels, owls, falcons, are here regarded as the natural servants and allies of Melko.

* In the later Tuor (p. 50) he is âLord of the Fountainsâ, plural (the reading in the manuscript is certain).

â In the version of âThe Silmarillionâ made in 1930 (See footnote on p. 208), the last account of the Fall of Gondolin to be written and the basis for that in chapter 23 of the published work, the text actually reads: ââ!much is told in The Fall of Gondolin: of the death of Rog without the walls, and of the battle of Ecthelion of the Fountainâ, &c. I removed the reference to Rog (The Silmarillion p. 242) on the grounds that it was absolutely certain that my father would not have retained this name as that of a lord of Gondolin.

* In a very late note written on one of the texts that constitute chapter 16 of The Silmarillion (âOf Maeglinâ) my father was thinking of making the âthree lords of his householdâ whom Turgon appointed to ride with Aredhel from Gondolin (p. 131) Glorfindel, Ecthelion, and Egalmoth. He notes that Ecthelion and Egalmoth âare derived from the primitive F[all of]G [ondolin]â, but that they âare well-sounding and have been in printâ (with reference to the names of the Stewards of Gondor). Subsequently he decided against naming Aredhelâs escort.

* The idea that Morgoth disposed of a âhostâ of Balrogs endured long, but in a late note my father said that only very few ever existedââat most sevenâ.

â This element in the story was in fact still present in the 1930 âSilmarillionâ (see footnote on p. 208), but I excluded it from the published work on account of evidence in a much later text that the old entrance to Gondolin had by this time been blocked upâa fact which was then written into the text in chapter 23 of The Silmarillion.

* It also seems to be at variance with the story that all Men were shut in Hithlum by Melko's decree after the Battle of Unnumbered Tears; but "wandering" is a strange word in the context, since the next words are "for Melko ringeth them in the Land of Shadows".

* In the margin of the manuscript is written: Fangluin: Bluebeard.

* It is said in the Gnomish dictionary that the curse of MÃ©m was âappeasedâ when the Nauglafring was lost in the sea; see the Appendix on Names, entry Nauglafring.

* For âNotebook Câ see p. 254.

* The words in this passage (âTree-men, Sun-dwellersâ|â) are clear but the punctuation is not, and the arrangement here may not be that intended.

* This preface is found in all the texts of the poem save the earliest, and the versions of it differ only in name-forms: Wingelot/Vingelot and Eglamar/Eldamar (varying in the same ways as in the accompanying versions of the poem, see textual notes p. 272), and $K\tilde{A} \uparrow > T\tilde{A} \gg n$ in the third text, $T\tilde{A} \gg n$ in the fourth. For Egla = Elda see I.251 and II.338, and for $T\tilde{A} \gg n$ see p. 292.

* From the Old English poem Crist: ȚȚalȚȚ! ȚȚarendel engla beorhtast ofer mid-dangeard monnum sended.

* From the Old English poem Crist: ȚȚalȚȚ! ȚȚarendel engla beorhtast ofer mid-dangeard monnum sended.

* A Northern Venture: see I.204, footnote. Mr Douglas A. Anderson has kindly supplied me with a copy of the poem in this version, which had been very slightly altered from that published in The Stapeldon Magazine (Exeter College, Oxford), June 1920 (Carpenter, p. 268).â€ˆ*Twilight* in line 5 of the Leeds version is almost certainly an error, for Twilit, the reading of all the original texts.

* The term "Faring Forth" is used here in a prophetic sense, not as it is in (18) and (20).

* Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and Frisians.

* In the sense of the March of the Elves from $K\tilde{A}^1r$, as in (18) and (20).

* There is no external evidence for this, but it can hardly be doubted. In this case it might be thought that since the African Kǎ'r was a city built on the top of a great mountain standing in isolation the relationship was more than purely âphonică.